According to a report in the Jerusalem Post, Hamas' program includes a restatement of its intention to pursue, "in all forms," the struggle against Israel's "occupation."

Hamas' leader-in-exile Khaled Meshal reiterated to a desperately doting western press his utter refusal to concede that Israel has a right to exist in the Middle East, too.

As of this writing, the cabinet has not yet been approved by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, as it must be under Palestinian law. But in truth, as Israel's foreign ministry spokesperson Mark Regev said , as long as the Hamas-led government was "unreformed and supports terrorism," it makes no difference who held the different portfolios. "The formation of this extremist Hamas government, which refuses to accept the three benchmarks articulated by UN Secretary General Kofi Annan – recognize Israel, renounce terrorism, and accept previous agreements – will not receive international legitimacy and will create a situation under which the Palestinian government will turn into a pariah regime."

Regev's remarks were echoed by some Palestinians, albeit too late. As reported in the Jerusalem Post, political analyst Hani al-Masri said Hamas' political program violates international law, which, he pointed out, is predicated upon governments honouring bilateral or multilateral international agreements signed by predecessor governments.

Nabil Abu Rudaineh, a spokesperson for Abbas, said Hamas' objectives would increase the isolation of the Palestinians. "This program does not comply with the requirements of the international community," he said. "Hamas' problem is not with us, but with the international community, which has clear political demands."

Ironically, Rudaineh's comment was like a magnifying glass unintentionally illuminating, in very large letters, the pathology that rots the core of Palestinian society. Hamas should have a problem with Rudaineh and Abbas. Hamas' "program" calls for the destruction of the Jewish state. The fact that this is not problematic for even the "moderate" Palestinian parties explains why Israel will refuse to deal with the openly hostile Palestinian government, but act decisively, and without hesitation, to protect the lives of its people.

Transnistria must not be forgotten

The article "Remember Romanian Kristallnacht" (CJN, Jan. 26) described the terrible atrocities committed against Romanian Jews by the fascist Iron Guard legionnaires.

That the Romanian fascists were the most brutal murderers is well-known, especially by those who witnessed their gruesome acts and lived to tell about it. Romania was a very anti-Semitic country and still is to this day.

However, nothing was mentioned about the thousands of Jews who perished in Transnistra.

In 1940, after giving Romania an ultimatum to withdraw, the Soviet Union annexed the two northern Romanian provinces, Northern Bucovina and Bassarabia, and declared them Soviet territory. Both Bucovina and Bassarabia had many well-established Jewish communities. In June 1941, Germany attacked the Soviet Union, and shortly thereafter those provinces were reoccupied by the Romanian and German armies. This was the beginning of a three-day pogrom that resulted in thousands of Jewish people being murdered in the most brutal way.

In total, from 1941 to 1944, some 350,000 Jews perished.

We hope that in the future any one writes about the suffering of Romanian Jewish people will not forget to mention Transnistria.

Cartoon showed disrespect for Yiddish

The cartoon with the dialogue, "You mean a shmitcionary..." (CJN, March 2), shows an ignorance, bias and disrespect for the Yiddish language and culture.

The cartoonist shows a woeful lack of proper Jewish education and upbringing.

It has long been acknowledged that we Jews are a richly bicultural and bilingual people who are fortunate to have and live with the Yiddish and Hebrew languages, literatures and cultures.

The vast majority of the six million Jews who perished in the Holocaust were Yiddish speaking. They lived, loved, laughed and cried in their (our) beloved language, Yiddish.

The editors should show a little more sensitivity and responsibility, before publishing such ignorant bias.

A correction to a correction

A correction to the editorial "The issue of fairness," (CJN, March 2), which was printed at the end of the March 9 editorial, stated, "We wrote that Ontario is the only jurisdiction in Canada that refuses to extend any funding to non-Catholic, faith-based schools. But this is also the case in the Atlantic provinces."

As a former Atlantic provinces resident, I feel it is unfair to imply that those provinces discriminate like Ontario. The Atlantic provinces do not fund any faith-based schools, Catholic or otherwise. By contrast, all other provinces, except Ontario, do fund faith-based schools, but have thriving public education systems also. What makes Ontario shamefully unique in Canada and the western democratic world is that it fully funds faith-based schools of one religion only to the total exclusion of others, in open violation of basic international human rights law that Ontario formally committed to observe.

Given that all three political parties in Ontario support Catholic school funding as required by the constitution, under which 93 per cent of Ontario's faith-based schools are already funded, the only fair and realistic way of removing this shameful distinction is to extend funding to the other seven per cent that are excluded solely because they are not Catholic.

Career-counselling information dated

The article "School says it's making great strides to provide more choices" (CJN, March 9) about career and university counselling at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) reflected experiences of graduates who left CHAT years ago.

For the record: in June 2005, CHAT students who knew their destinations for September 2006 – all except six of 300 graduates – were headed to 26 different universities and colleges across Canada, the United States and Israel to study in more than 40 different programs – and a greater variety of courses – covering almost every conceivable choice. More than 40 students deferred entry to take time off in Israel first.

To date, in the present school year, more than 20 Canadian and American universities – and a huge number of Israeli programs have made recruitment visits to both CHAT campuses.

We are proud of all of our students and want to open as many windows as possible for them. CHAT policy is to offer our students the widest number of choices and the fullest information. A CHAT education is a truly outstanding springboard for life – including, but certainly not limited to, careers in medicine and law.

UNRWA—a clear case of double standards?

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
JTA

Armed gunmen roamed freely in United Nations refugee camps. They stockpiled weapons, recruited refugees and launched cross-border attacks.

In response, opposing forces attacked the camps, aiming for the gunmen – but sometimes cutting down civilians in the process.

The international community was troubled both by the instability fomented and the thought of the beleaguered refugees – exploited within the camps, denied a truly safe haven, then caught in the crossfire.

So the United Nations took action.

U.N. Secretary General Kofi Annan produced a pair of landmark reports singling out the militarization of refugee camps as a cause of conflict and insecurity. He called for the "separation of armed elements from refugee populations" to maintain the camps' civilian character. And he outlined several steps to police the camps.

The UN Security Council followed suit in 1998 with Resolution 1208, defending the sanctity of refugee camps and criminalizing their militarization.

What was the source of this international concern – the Palestinian camps in Gaza and the West Bank? No, it was Africa in the mid-1990s, when civil wars in Rwanda, Burundi, Liberia and elsewhere unleashed torrents of refugees across the continent.

To defenders of Israel, the scenario described above sounds familiar. They question why the world body has never applied Resolution 1208 to the 27 UN refugee camps in Gaza and the West Bank, which were a prime source of attacks during the violent Palestinian uprising that began in September 2000.

Security Council resolutions carry the weight of international law – and Resolution 1208 itself makes note of the fact that it should be universally applied.

The question of the Palestinian exception to 1208 is more than theoretical. Despite moves toward reform in other areas, the UN General Assembly is unlikely to make any changes to the United Nations Relief and Works Agency, which provides relief and social services to the majority of Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza. Thus, an appeal to the Security Council to apply Resolution 1208 may be a viable option if, as some predict, the intifadah is renewed and terrorists again use UNRWA camps to plan and launch attacks against Israel.

Annan himself underscored the universality of Resolution 1208 in March 2001 when reports of similar abuses emerged from refugee camps in West Timor.

"Not separating combatants from civilians allows armed groups to take control of a camp and its population, politicizing their situation and gradually establishing a military culture within the camp," Annan wrote.

"The impact on the safety and security of both the refugees and the neighboring local population is severe. Entire camp populations can be held hostage by militias that operate freely in the camps, spread terror, press-gang civilians, including children, into serving their forces."

Yet Annan hasn't voiced similar outrage regarding Palestinian militancy in UNRWA camps.

For example, on Oct. 6, 2002, Palestinians in the Khan Yunis camp in Gaza launched a mortar attack on a Jewish settlement. The next day Israel fired a missile from a helicopter gunship, killing 14 people, among them accused militants and civilians.

On Oct. 8, Annan issued a statement deploring Israel's "military attack in civilian areas" and the Jewish state's "reckless disregard" for civilian life. However, he ignored the fact that the original mortar attack was launched from among civilians, settling for a bland "appeal to both sides to halt all violent and provocative acts."

One Jewish group lodged a protest with the UN chief. Harry Reicher, at the time the UN representative for Agudath Israel World Organization, wrote Annan to contrast his outspokenness on West Timor with his "silence" on "the continuing strategy, pursued by the leadership of the Palestinians, of locating terrorists, as well as caches of their arms, in heavily-populated civilian areas" and the "use of civilian men, women and children as human shields."

UNRWA says it acknowledges Israel's security needs and right to self-defence, but that civilian well-being should take priority.

An UNRWA defender agrees.

"Of course there are people trying to use these places, but having armed people inside the camps doesn't legitimize Israel's attacks on civilians," says Raji Sourani, director of the Gaza-based Palestinian Centre for Human Rights.

Yet critics say that if UNRWA is really concerned about civilians, it should speak out against any action that endangers them – including Palestinian attacks launched from among civilians that provoke Israeli retaliation.

What could be more guaranteed to encourage the Palestinian use of refugees as human shields "than the certain knowledge that, if Palestinian civilians are tragically killed, it is Israel that will be blamed by the United Nations?" asked Reicher, a professor of international law at the University of Pennsylvania.

The militarization of UNRWA camps is not a recent revelation. Back in 1982, former U.S. president Ronald Reagan accused UNRWA of allowing its Lebanese camps to become armed bastions of the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Forced to investigate when Reagan threatened to withhold U.S. funding for the organization, UNRWA admitted that several camps indeed had been militarized.

While the Security Council hasn't enforced 1208 in the Palestinian territories, it has applied pressure on militant Palestinian refugees elsewhere.

Resolution 1559, passed in September 2004, demanded that "foreign forces" – an allusion to Syria – withdraw from Lebanon. Syria finally did end its 29-year occupation last April, two months after being implicated in the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri.

Resolution 1559 also calls for the "disbanding and disarmament of all Lebanese and non-Lebanese militias" – a reference to the pro-Syrian Hezbollah militia and to Palestinian terrorist groups in UNRWA's 12 Lebanese camps. That part of 1559 has not been implemented.

After rockets were fired from Lebanon into Israel in late December, Resolution 1559 once again gained the United Nations' attention.

Al Qaeda claimed credit for the attack, reportedly its first on Israel. But some suggested it was carried out by Palestinian terrorists only loosely connected to Osama bin Laden's global terror network.

The next day, Annan called on the Lebanese government "to extend its control over all its territory, to exert its monopoly on the use of force, and to put an end to all such attacks."

Still, from Israel's perspective, militancy in UNRWA's Lebanese camps is far less immediate a threat than militancy in Gaza and the West Bank.

Some Palestinian supporters argue that Resolution 1208 shouldn't apply to the West Bank – or, before Israel's withdrawal last summer, to the Gaza Strip – because Palestinians there are engaged in "legitimate resistance to occupation."

Israel's defenders, though, say it's a clear case of double standards.

"Here the UN has adopted clear criteria for how refugee camps are supposed to be maintained, and consistently fails to apply its own law when it comes to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict," said Dore Gold, Israel's former UN ambassador and current president of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs.

"One of the most compelling arguments for demonstrating how Israel is systematically denied the same rights and privileges given to other [UN] member states is the story of Resolution 1208."

Resolution 1208 clearly should apply to UNRWA, said Astrid Van Genderen Stort, a spokesperson for the UN High Commission for Refugees, known as UNHCR, which handles the world's other 19.2 million refugees.

"The Israelis may say UNRWA is not protecting the camps well enough, or that we can do a better security job, but I don't think UNRWA would ever say 1208 doesn't apply," Van Genderen Stort said. "If UNRWA people knew there were terrorists firing weapons from the camps, they should remove these people from the camps. But I can't speak for UNRWA. I'm not on the ground."

In an interview with JTA, UNRWA Commissioner-General Karen Koning AbuZayd acknowledged that Resolution 1208 officially applies to UNRWA camps, but added that "it requires action to be taken by the authorities where the camps are located, not by the humanitarian agencies."

"We don't run camps. That is the responsibility of the sovereign governments and authorities wherever the camps are based," she said. "It's like asking, 'What has Bethesda Hospital done to combat street gangs in Washington, D.C.?' We do send situation reports to the UN's security department and the office of the secretary general. These are simple, straightforward factual accounts of clashes and other incidents."

Yet a line needs to be drawn somewhere, Van Genderen Stort said.

"For me, a refugee camp is a place where people in need of protection or assistance can find it," she said. "A refugee camp shouldn't be a battleground or a place where criminals are hiding."

If the intifadah resumes and UN camps again become terrorist staging grounds, some pro-Israel activists say they'd revive a push for the Security Council to apply Resolution 1208 to UNRWA's turf.

"I hope the UN will use the same standards to ensure the humanitarian nature of refugee camps in the Palestinian territories as they've mandated for the rest of the world," said Felice Gaer, a human-rights expert for the American Jewish Committee. "Exceptionalism for Palestinian refugee camps would be just another way of revealing the UN has often used a double standard when it comes to the Middle East conflict."

If Resolution 1208 were applied, UNRWA would be obliged to report violations to the UN secretary general, who would be obliged to deliver the information to the Security Council. Observers say it's not inconceivable that, with their actions placed under the microscope, terrorists might be flushed from the camps, cut off from a prime source of recruits and denied a sanctuary from which to plan and launch attacks.

Given the political realities at the United Nations, that may be a pipe dream. But if nothing else, critics say, even the negative publicity might strike a symbolic blow.

A short history

JTA

The UN General Assembly established the United Nations Relief and Works Agency in 1949 as a temporary agency focused on relief work for the Palestinians. It began operating in 1950.

Hundreds of thousands of Palestinians became refugees in the war that began when Palestinians and their Arab allies attacked the fledgling Jewish state the day after its independence in 1948.

Some were purposely flushed from their homes as Jewish forces sought to secure key roads and pacify areas from which Jewish communities had been attacked. Some were encouraged to leave by the Arab states, which told the refugees that they could return shortly to claim the spoils after the Jews were killed. Many simply fled what had become a combat zone.

The Palestinians constituted just one of many refugee populations in the years after World War II, and many outsiders expected their case to be the easiest of the postwar refugee crises to resolve. Many found shelter in neighbouring countries that shared their language, religion and culture, and where many of them had blood ties.

Indeed, the roughly equal number of Jewish refugees who fled or were expelled from the Muslim world during the same period were quickly resettled in Israel or in the West.

Unlike the U.N. High Commission for Refugees, or UNHCR, which serves the world's other 19.2 million refugees, UNRWA was not tasked with finding solutions to the refugees' plight.

Instead, UNRWA's definition of refugee – which counted even migrants who had lived in the area for as little as two years – further expanded in the 1950s when, in an unprecedented move, UNRWA included descendants of the original refugees. This was an expanded definition that the UNHCR never adopted.

Thus, while other refugee groups have dwindled due to resettlement or death, the Palestinian refugee population, uniquely, continues to grow – from 914,000 registered refugees in 1950 to some 4.3 million today, roughly one-third of whom live in the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

The Oslo syndrome

The signing of the Declaration of Principles (Oslo accords) in September 1993 was universally endorsed as the most important breakthrough in Arab-Israeli relations in recent memory. However, just hours afterward, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat was already referring to the accords as merely a vehicle for a "plan of phases," whereby the PLO would first wrest territorial concessions through negotiation and then use such gains to pursue the ultimate goal of eradicating Israel.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

In the years that followed, large segments of the Israeli public and media – all longing for an era of protracted peace – clung desperately to the illusion of a new reality, even as terror attacks on Israeli civilians escalated and it became increasingly clear that Arafat and his cronies were breaching their agreements on an almost daily basis.

And with Arafat's final act of intransigence at Camp David in 2000 (followed by his unleashing of the second intifadah), the prospect of Israeli-Palestinian coexistence within the framework of an implementable peace process was at last exposed as yet another mirage among the many that had preceded it.

What analysts were left with was the vexing question of what went wrong? How could a politically sophisticated Israeli society, with a savvy press and a leadership that knew its history, have been duped, and for so long, by a Palestinian regime that was so obviously duplicitous and destructive?

To provide some insight into the mindset that could have allowed this to happen, psychiatrist and historian Kenneth Levin believes the answer may lie in psychological responses that are common among chronically besieged populations, whether minorities subjected to defamation, discrimination, and assault, or small nations under persistent attack by their neighbours. People living under such stressful conditions often choose to accept at face value the indictments of their accusers in the hope of thereby escaping their predicament.

In his book The Oslo Syndrome: Delusions of a People Under Siege (2005, Smith and Kraus Global), Levin uses the failed Oslo process as the paradigm for describing the collective denial among Israelis during the years the Oslo debacle was unfolding. In the first few chapters, he also reflects on a somewhat similar phenomenon in Diaspora communities, which have had to deal with the various existential threats that have confronted them, again and again, since medieval times.

The Oslo Syndrome presents a perspective that is both self-critical and enlightening. In cautioning us against succumbing to the often subtle appeal of positions that promote universalism or transient inclusiveness, even at the expense of appeasement or capitulation, it seems also to exhort us to informatively and unabashedly embrace the precepts of Jewish identity and the centrality of Israel as the very foundations for making a convincing counter-argument.

Olmert tries to set the agenda

By LESLIE SUSSER

Ehud Olmert's pledge to unilaterally establish Israel's permanent borders within four years could turn out to be the defining moment of the country's election campaign.

With the announcement, the interim prime minister pre-empted the Labor Party to the left and sharpened his Kadima Party's differences with Likud to the right.

Labor claims Olmert has stolen its ideas. Likud says he has turned the election into a referendum on his plan to cede territory without getting anything in return.

With Kadima slipping in the polls, Olmert took a huge gamble. Some right-wingers claim that by putting his cards so clearly on the table, he plays into their hands.

Beyond electioneering, Olmert's statement has major regional and international ramifications. On the Palestinian side, Hamas leader Khaled Meshal called it a "declaration of war" against the Palestinians. And Israeli pundits wonder whether Israel will be able to set permanent borders, recognized by the international community, without negotiating with the Palestinians.

In interviews with all the Israeli dailies, Olmert outlined his plan: By 2010, isolated West Bank settlements will be dismantled and settlers relocated in large blocs closer to the pre-1967 boundary, known as the Green Line. The security fence will become the new, permanent border, with Israelis on one side, Palestinians on the other. In some cases the fence will be moved further east, in others further west, to correspond with the new boundary route.

The new, permanent border will consolidate Israel as a Jewish state with an overwhelming Jewish majority.

According to Olmert, the Palestinians will be given a limited amount of time to enter talks, but if they don't, Israel will carry out the plan unilaterally. In the absence of a Palestinian partner, Israel will negotiate the border lines with the international community.

It will also hold a dialogue with the settlers aimed at reaching consensus on which settlements will be evacuated and where settlers will be relocated.

These ideas had previously been leaked by other Kadima leaders and aides, but this is the first time Olmert has openly backed them.

In going public two weeks before the election, Olmert apparently hoped to kill two birds with one stone, giving voters a clear vision they can latch onto and pre-empting a mooted Labor-Likud coalition that would form a government in Kadima's stead.

Kadima strategists believe this clarity is what voters want to hear. Compared to Labor's insistence on talks with a non-existent Palestinian partner and the Likud's doom-and-gloom predictions, Olmert's formula will attract conflict-weary Israelis, they argue.

Olmert's policy statement also makes a Likud-Labor coalition that bypasses Kadima virtually impossible. How would Labor justify choosing Likud when Olmert is committed to a withdrawal almost identical to Labor's own proposed pullback, political analyst Yossi Verter asked in Ha'aretz.

"Olmert's move struck down the hallucinatory visions of a Labor-right-wing coalition to block Kadima," he wrote. "What could the Likud offer [Labor] after the election? A bigger pullout than Olmert's?"

With Olmert setting the agenda, Likud and Labor are trying to turn his candor to their advantage. Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu hardened his already hawkish line in a bid to discredit Olmert as too dovish. The Likud, Netanyahu said, would not countenance unilateral withdrawals or a Palestinian state, and would not join a coalition led by someone "as left-wing as Olmert."

Labor took the opposite tack: Implementing Olmert's policies would require a strong Labor contingent in the coalition, party activists argued.

Some right-wingers, however, are convinced Olmert has made a huge error that could cost him the election. Right-wing settlers are trying to use Olmert's plan to trigger wholesale defections from Kadima. Their aim: to shift eight seats from Kadima to the right-wing parties, enough to give the right an upset victory.

That's a tall order, and the smart money is still on Olmert to win the election. His forthrightness might even increase his majority.

The question then becomes whether he will be able to get the international community to recognize borders Israel decides for itself, without consulting the Palestinians. Getting such support is clearly a major part of Olmert's strategy. Before he made his statement, he put out feelers to the Americans, with whom he hopes to co-ordinate any pullback.

Israeli sources say the Americans understand that with the terror group Hamas in power on the Palestinian side, Israel must consider unilateral moves. And Israel believes that if the United States recognizes permanent borders, the rest of the international community will follow.

Olmert hopes his plan will win him the election and then write him into the history books as the leader who finally established Israel's permanent borders – after more than 60 years of statehood – around 2010.

Abusing medicine for propaganda

If there's one area where the benefits of peace between Arabs and Israelis should be obvious, it's health care. Indeed, many Palestinians, Jordanians, Saudis and others come to Israeli hospitals for treatments that aren't available in their countries. Even when the terrorist attacks were at their most violent and other forms of co-operation between Israelis and Palestinians ended, the health links remained. Medical professionals understand that viruses and disease are impervious to politics.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

For this reason, the intrusion of coarse politics and ugly propaganda via Bridges: An Israeli-Palestinian Public Health Magazine is particularly damaging. This publication is undermining precisely the co-operation that its sponsors claim to be promoting.

Bridges is published by the World Health Organization, an international body based in Geneva that works closely with the United Nations and suffers from many of the same maladies, such as promoting anti-Israel propaganda in every possible realm by exploiting universal norms such as human rights.

Most issues of Bridges, now in its second year, mix soft health care pieces with anti-Israel propaganda written by Palestinians, as well as some fringe Israelis who believe that the key to peace is to accept responsibility for terror and incitement. Substantive non-political articles on health issues do not offset the blatantly political and ideological pieces that are carefully placed between the others.

The political articles follow the standard propaganda line: Palestinians are always portrayed as victims, while Israeli checkpoints, occupation, and other measures are blamed for their suffering. There is no mention of PLO corruption, or the history of Arab rejectionism that led to wars and "occupation," and there are few references to the context and cause of the checkpoints: Palestinian terror.

NGOs that exploit human rights and humanitarian claims in order to demonize Israel, such as Physicians for Human Rights-Israel and the Palestinian Human Rights Committee, are regularly given space to promote their ideology in Bridges. The February-March 2005 edition included an article authored by a French-based anti-Israel NGO known as Médecins du Monde. Headlined "The Separation Barrier to Health Care," it was a blatantly political piece on "the wall." The only references to medical issues were in unverified allegations about "the deterioration of the Palestinian health care system due to the ongoing construction of the wall." The relation between the separation barrier and terror was surgically removed, and readers are asked to support "healthandwall.org."

The next article was about an Israeli victim of terror, an artificial attempt to provide false political balance in a health care publication. It was followed in turn by a portrait of a Palestinian who had been crippled after having been allegedly shot by an Israeli soldier.

Medical professionals on both sides live this conflict daily, and superficial political articles are counterproductive. Indeed, a surprisingly honest evaluation published in the December 2005/January 2006 edition reported that readers view the publication as "too politically biased or not well balanced" and ineffective in promoting co-operative projects. Predictably, the evaluation noted that "Palestinian authors openly talked about the conflict and the occupation, whereas Israelis did not." It said that in the first six issues, of the articles in the magazine's "Happening in Health" section, "nine addressed the occupation. Yet no news item mentioned terrorism."

But the editors ignored this evaluation in the next issue (February-March 2006), where, between professional articles on challenges in nursing, the politics and propaganda increased. Moving further away from health, the editors devoted central pages to Hanan Ashrawi – a member of the PLO leadership and keynote speaker at the infamous 2001 World Conference on Racism in Durban, South Africa – as well as to MK Tamar Gozansky of the Israeli Communist fringe. Ashwari repeated the cliches of Palestinian victimization and Israeli occupation, while Gozansky accused Israel of "the dehumanization of Palestinians." For medical professionals seeking to go beyond the conflict, these articles mark a dead end.

Since the editors seem committed to this destructive path, if this publication is to continue, its editorial board must be revamped and the political content dropped. Otherwise, funders should pull the plug to prevent greater damage in the name of peace and put their money into expanding the co-operation seen in the daily contacts between Israelis and Arabs in hospitals and clinics, and via exchanges of public health information.

The Kirshner File

Serge Klarsfeld is still driven by the past

Serge Klarsfeld, clad in an impeccably cut navy blue suit, an immaculately pressed white shirt and a silky blue polka dot tie, looks comfortable and prosperous. He wears rimless silver glasses that accentuate his twinkling pale eyes, reflect the morning light and call attention to his balding pate. A grandfatherly figure who sits demurely in a high-ceiling room filled with books and folders and who speaks softly, Klarsfeld does not convey the impression of a man possessed.

Sheldon Kirshner in Paris

Yet Klarsfeld is driven. At the age of 70, he is probably the world's most famous living Nazi hunter, credited with having brought to justice war criminals ranging from Maurice Papon to Klaus Barbie; convinced the president of France, Jacques Chirac, to acknowledge his country's complicity in the deaths of some 80,000 Jews during the Holocaust; and exerted pressure on France to establish a commission to study the confiscation of Jewish property during the Vichy era.

A Holocaust survivor who has been compared to the late Simon Wiesenthal, Klarsfeld and his equally motivated wife, Beate, a German convert to Judaism, are best known for their quest in tracking down "desk murderers"

French and German officials who signed or implemented orders to arrest and deport foreign and native-born Jews in France during the four-year German occupation.

A lawyer and historian by training, Klarsfeld is secure in the knowledge that he succeeded in smoking out and bringing to trial these individuals. "There are no more known desk murderers in France alive today," he said. In undertaking this awesome task, Klarsfeld and his wife endangered their own lives. Twenty-seven years ago, their parked car was blown up by a bomb, and since then, they have received a succession of death threats

These days, Klarsfeld – the president of the Sons and Daughters of the Jewish Deportees of France, an organization he founded in 1970 to perpetuate the memory of the Holocaust devotes much of his time to memorial projects and the writing of books. He and Beate, a vivacious woman he met by chance in a Paris subway station in 1960, are also the principals of the Beate Klarsfeld Foundation, which funds Holocaust exhibits and publishes books

Their exhibits have shattered what, until recently, was a national smugness concerning the Vichy period. In the late 1970s, one of their exhibits, turning on Vichy's Jewish policy, was the cause of considerable soul-searching and debate. More recently, their exhibit on the deportation of 11,400 Jewish children from France, mounted in various railway stations, elicited a tsunami of comment and reflection.

By his reckoning, almost 80,000 French and stateless Jews were killed from 1940 until '44. Seventy-five thousand seven hundred were deported, of whom only 2,564 returned. Klarsfeld's father, Arno, was one of the victims, having been transported to and gassed in Auschwitz in 1943. Three thousand Jews died in French internment camps, while a further 1,000 were murdered by German soldiers and French police. But, as Klarsfeld pointed out, 240,000 Jews – or three-quarters of France's Jewish population – survived, thanks in no small part to the decency of French men and women.

In 1992, he launched a campaign to rebuild the Judenrampe, the railway platform where all deported Jews in Auschwitz-Birkenau arrived between June 1942 and May 1944. The work was undertaken by the Foundation for the Memory of the Shoah, a French organization of which he is a director and which is headed by former cabinet minister and Holocaust survivor Simone Veil. On Jan. 27, 2005, the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, the Judenrampe was officially inaugurated. Klarsfeld, in association with the Polish government, has also worked to rehabilitate crumbling buildings in the camp. As well, he and Beate were instrumental in the building of a commemorative monument in Israel in honour of the Jews who died in France. Their two children, Arno-David and Lida-Myriam, both lawyers, have taken up their cause.

Klarsfeld, who studied history at the Sorbonne, has written 10 books, only two of which have been published in English. The titles range from French Children of the Holocaust to An Auschwitz Album. He is currently finishing a six-volume book with the names and addresses of all adults deported from France. "I do not write for a mass audience," he explained. "I publish books for researchers, to influence them."

Klarsfeld was born in Bucharest, Romania, while his mother, Raissa, was visiting her parents. She and her husband had been living in Paris since 1928 as university students. In 1943, when Klarsfeld was eight years old, SS troops, commanded by Alois Brunner, rounded up the Jews of Nice, where he and his family resided. Prior to this, the Klarsfelds had lived in relative security under the Italian occupation. As the SS arrested his father – a veteran of the French Foreign Legion who fought in World War II – he and his sister and mother cowered in a closet. Assisted by their fellow countrymen, they subsequently went into hiding.

Nearly two decades later, Klarsfeld visited Auschwitz, where his father perished. "I keenly felt his disappearance, and wanted to pay homage to him." By then, he had met Beate Kunzel, whose father, a German soldier, was sent to France in the summer of 1940. "We met as we waited for a train," he recalled. "She was a nice young woman. Our personalities meshed. We met again and again and, now, we have been together for 45 years."

Serge Klarsfeld

Beate Klarsfeld

When they bumped into each other on that fateful day, Beate knew little about the Holocaust beyond the fact that millions of Jews had been killed. "I gave her books and articles to read so that she could better understand Germany's history." Three years after their marriage in 1963, Beate wrote a newspaper piece accusing the new German chancellor, Kurt-Georg Kiesinger, of having concealed his past as a Nazi propaganda official. Disguised as a reporter, she confronted him with shouts of "Nazi, Nazi" and slapped him on the face. The slap was front-page news around the globe. "We had to shock public opinion," said Klarsfeld, who jointly planned the incident with her.

Turning to unfinished business, the young couple, in 1971, attempted to kidnap Kurt Lischke, the wartime Gestapo chief for Jewish affairs in France. He evaded capture, but in 1979, he was finally imprisoned. Then the Klarsfelds went after Lischka's colleague and Adolf Eichmann's associate, Herbert Hagen. He, too, was tried, charged with committing crimes against humanity. "These were important cases," said Klarsfeld. "Germany finally agreed to try accused Nazi officials for crimes committed in France."

At around the same time, they focused their efforts on reopening the Barbie case. As an SS officer, Barbie, the so-called Butcher of Lyon, was responsible for the deaths of 26,000 people, including Jews. Klarsfeld hatched a plot to kidnap Barbie in Bolivia, where he had fled, but it fizzled. Not until 1983 was Barbie extradited to France. Sentenced in 1987 to life imprisonment, he died of cancer in jail in 1991.

Setting their sights on French war criminals, the Klarsfelds pursued three of them: Papon, a senior Vichy police official who was involved in the deportation of Jews, Paul Touvier, who headed Vichy's police force in Lyon and participated in the deportations, and Rene Bousquet, the secretary-general of the French police. Papon, convicted of war crimes in 1998 and given a 10-year prison term, escaped to Switzerland. Sent back to France by the Swiss, Papon was imprisoned, but in 2002, he was released on grounds of ill health. Touvier was sentenced to life imprisonment in 1994 and died in 1996. Bousquet was assassinated at his home in Paris in 1993.

One German war criminal who eluded their grasp was SS officer Brunner. He administered the Drancy transit camp near Paris from which Jews were dispatched to Auschwitz and organized the deportations of Jews from Austria and Greece. After the war, he vanished, but the Klarsfelds traced him to Syria. Klarsfeld twice travelled to Damascus in an abortive bid to convince the Syrian government to extradite Brunner to France. He believes that Brunner is now dead.

Starting in the 1980s, Klarsfeld opened informal talks with Chirac, then mayor of Paris, on the need for France to issue a formal apology for its role in the treatment of Jews. In 1995, Chirac, the newly elected president, acknowledged France's responsibility. Klarsfeld and others then convinced the government to create the Matteoli Commission, whose importance in restitution cases cannot be underestimated.

Looking back at his long career, Klarsfeld wants to be remembered for having devoted his life to the memory of Jews who died in France during the Shoah, and as Beate's husband. "Our union brought something," he said in a monumental understatement.

The Jewish Education Report

Students display passion for learning, song and dance

By Suzanne Wintrob

Last month, 600 students from Toronto's Jewish day schools, supplementary schools and universities joined forces to share their passion for singing. This month, 25 Jewish schools from across Canada will take part in a contest that demonstrates their passion for Torah. And in April, 400 students from Jewish schools in Toronto, Hamilton and London, Ont., will whirl and twirl to the sounds of Israeli music to show off their passion for dance.

"Our students need to know that there is a Jewish community beyond their respective schools, and these events offer them a taste of our vibrant, multi-faceted, pluralistic Jewish community," says the Board of Jewish Education's (BJE) Yael Seliger, UJA Federation's vice-president for Jewish Education and Identity. "Educators, too, appreciate these informal experiences in the lives of students because, as they know, it's precisely these kinds of experiential moments that make a huge impact on their young lives."

Interschool spirit was certainly on display in February, when 18 choirs took to the stage at the Toronto Centre for the Arts as part of Zimriya 2006. They performed two shows to capacity crowds, singing as separate choirs and also as one big happy family. Hamilton's Kehila Jewish Community Day School choir, comprised of 26 students from senior kindergarten through Grade 3, made its first Zimriya appearance. Other choirs included two a cappella acts from the University of Toronto and York University, and the Renanim choir made up of public and supplementary school students. All songs were in Hebrew.

"There's nothing like having hundreds of students singing together in Hebrew," says Ora Shulman, Zimriya coordinator and director of the BJE's Teacher Centre. "One grandparent ran up to me after the program and said, 'Oh, thank you for making me feel Jewish again.'"

Allison Bernholtz, a Grade 10 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Richmond Hill Campus, was one of the lucky few chosen as a soloist for the mass choir.

"What really made me proud was being in a room that displayed so much Jewish unity," says Allison, 15. "It's inspiring to see so many kids involved in this Jewish event at such a young age."

Last week, students in Grade 5 and above from 25 Jewish schools across Canada competed in the annual Chidon HaTanach (Bible Contest). Students spent months studying together with their teachers, and the BJE provided sample questions on the website for students to practice.

"We're training students to study the Bible, the common themes, and how the books are connected," says Silvia Eilath, contest coordinator and the BJE's day school consultant. "Our teachers go well beyond the call of duty and deserve a great deal of praise for their dedication and commitment. We are instilling a love of the Bible in the students."

In addition to the regional contest, the supplementary school students participated in a local Bible contest in which teams of students competed against each other. This year's winning teams were Shaar Shalom and Beth Jacob, Hamilton – first place; Temple Kol Ami – second place; Beit Rayim team 3 – third place.

Qualified students from day and supplementary schools will compete at the National contest on May 14-16 in Toronto, with high school winners heading off to Israel the following year to compete in the Diaspora contest.

Next up is dancing. About 400 boys and girls from 17 day and supplementary schools will unite on April 2 for the annual Rikudiya, co-sponsored by the BJE and the Koffler Centre of the Arts, Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

Once again, it's a chance for kids to come together, learn from each other, and express their Jewish pride. For details and photos of these and other interschool programs, visit www.bjetoronto.org

Supplementary schools benefit from innovative initiatives

Toronto's supplementary school programs are certainly brimming with action. About 5,500 students, from preschoolers to high schoolers, flock to 42 synagogues, community centres, university campuses and public schools to immerse themselves in Jewish learning. To help enrich the curriculum with dynamic programming, the Board of Jewish Education (BJE) is supporting a number of initiatives aimed specifically at supplementary school programming and the teachers who make it happen.

Call it a match made in Hebrew school. Perry Silverberg has wanted to be a teacher for as long as he can remember. The Toronto resident spent three summers honing his skills as a senior staff member at Nova Scotia's Camp Kadima. He then landed a job as a classroom assistant at Toronto's Temple Sinai supplementary school, working there on Sundays and spending his weekdays studying for a joint degree in Drama in Education and Religious Studies at York University.

This year, Silverberg not only earned himself a full-fledged Grade 5 class but also a mentor who is grooming him for his future teaching career.

Karin Charash spent years teaching in her native Israel before moving to Toronto and taking a position at Temple Sinai. That's where she and Silverberg met, and they've worked together – as mentor and apprentice – ever since.

"Karin has lots of wonderful ideas to keep kids engaged, which is exactly what I want to be doing as a teacher," says Silverberg, 25, who plans to attend teachers' college. "It's quite helpful when it comes down to finding new ways to get kids out of their seat and having fun while they're in the classroom."

Half a dozen matches like this one are on the go at supplementary schools in the GTA, made possible by the BJE's new Mentorship for Growth program funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Covenant Foundation.

"Hands-on training is often better than professional development," says program coordinator and BJE supplementary school consultant Beth Komito-Gottlieb. "New teachers have lots of opportunities to go to workshops and in-house training, but to have somebody assigned who is more skilled and experienced to give you support and guidance is really ideal."

Charash admits she gets as much satisfaction out of the mentorship as her apprentice does, perhaps because she knows what it's like to struggle. When she moved to Canada three years ago, she says, "nobody approached me and told me what to do. There's a gap between two different cultures and countries so I understand very well what it's like to need some guidance."

At Temple Sinai, director of education, Dr. Ira Schweitzer is constantly on the lookout for other innovative ideas, as well. This year, thanks to a UJA Federation program enhancement grant, Temple Sinai students are immersed in more Hebrew music, creating artwork with a link to Israel, and exploring Jewish texts by "learning the ropes."

The grants, available to all affiliated supplementary school programs, have allowed Temple Sinai to hire a music teacher to take the students beyond the usual Israeli songs. Rather, they're focusing on the prayers themselves – or, as Dr. Schweitzer calls it, "skills for synagogue living" – to get them excited about going to services.

In addition, the grant allowed the school to purchase Torah "yadim" (pointers) made by elderly Jerusalemites, with each one decorated by a bar/bat mitzvah student. They also used the money to hire a ropes course instructor at Camp George near Parry Sound, Ontario, to combine Torah study with movement.

"With extra dollars provided through these grants, we're able to enhance our programming considerably and get our kids excited about learning," says Dr. Schweitzer.

Principals' Mission to Israel a real eye-opener

When Jan Lapedus set off to Israel last month, tucked into her suitcase was a photo album filled with pictures of her Grade 7 students. Over the year, her students have formed a meaningful long-distance relationship with students at Maalch Shacharut School in Eilat, comparing notes on Jewish history and lifestyles on both sides of the ocean. Pictures, she felt, would let them finally "meet" face to face.

Lapedus, principal of The Leo Baeck Day School's Atkinson campus, was among 10 principals from seven Toronto day schools who took part in the Board of Jewish Education's (BJE) first-ever Principals' Mission to Israel. The five-day adventure focused on the southern region of Eilat-Eilot, which is twinned with Toronto's Jewish community through the Jewish Agency's Partnership 2000 (P2K) initiative. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is investing heavily in the partnership, which is concentrating strongly on the quality of education in Eilat-Eilot, from elementary school to university.

The group learned, among other things, how Israeli educators deal with underachievers and how they develop relationships between formal and informal education.

But the highlight was visiting the area's schools to see how Israeli teachers tackle similar issues, and to identify joint programs to incorporate within their own classrooms.

"We met a very committed group of principals representing schools from across the religious spectrum," says Netivot HaTorah Day School principal Dr. Reuven Stern. "It was wonderful to see their dedication to the Eilat population and their recognition of the wonderful contributions made to their community by Toronto Jewry." Before leaving for Israel, Lapedus and the principal of her "twinned" school in Eilat had talked of a joint project for her Grade 6 classes to explore Eilat's Timna Park through biblical research while the Israeli students would explore an agricultural site at nearby Kibbutz Yotvata. They would exchange information via teleconferencing. As well, she returned home with new ideas for ecology, music and arts programs.

Dr. Stern, who calls the trip an "eye-opener", plans to unite students through Torah learning using the Internet and web conferencing.

Rabbi Natan Kandler, the Jewish Agency for Israel's representative at the BJE, says many educators talk about enhancing Jewish education but often have difficulty finding the right approach that will grab a child's attention. That's why the first principals' mission was so valuable, he believes.

A touch of Israel comes to Toronto schools

When a group of young Israelis finds itself among Toronto students, watch out. Exciting things are sure to happen

Last month, four Israelis in their 20s brought a touch of Israel to the city's day and supplementary schools. They ran carnivals, dressed up in costumes, acted, sang, danced and just plain had fun. But it wasn't performing they were after. Rather, it was all in the name of getting their audience talking about their Jewish identity and their connection to the land of Israel.

"These madrichim (leaders) represent the best of Israel," says Rabbi Natan Kandler, the Jewish Agency's emissary at the Board of Jewish Education (BJE). "They're passionate about Israel, they're ideological and Zionistic, and they're trained educators. Their goal is to work with the widest spectrum of the community - schools, university campuses and youth groups - to give a balanced view of Israel."

Madrichim from Israel run a session with Toronto students.

Tuvia Cannon led the third annual Israeli contingent for this year's program,dubbed the Zionist Seminars. "It's very interesting to see how Canadian schools operate and how a large group of Jews outside of Israel live together and build such a vibrant community," he says.

Among the schools they visited was the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School where they hosted a game of Israeli Idol. The madrichim donned costumes of prominent historical figures who have made significant contributions to Israeli society and the students participated in various games related to the figures.

"The program provided an opportunity for our students to broaden their knowledge of Israel and Israeli society directly from young Israelis to whom they can relate," says She'arim principal Kathy Manoim "The enthusiasm, warmth and sensitivity displayed towards our students by the leaders contributed greatly to the success of the program."

The Zionist Seminars run the gamut from elementary to high school levels.

During their two week visit, the madrichim ran 58 programs, reaching more than 2000 students.

Where Are they Now?

Eric Golombek

If Eric Golombek had listened to the advice of an online career planning service when he was in high school, he could have ended up working as a ferryboat operator or a funeral director. Instead, he's now branch principal of his old alma mater.

"It's kind of weird being back here, especially since some of the same people who were my teachers back then are still here," says Golombek, head of Associated Hebrew School's Posluns campus. "But on the other hand, it's exciting to come back to the place that gave me my start and made me passionate about my Judaism. Here I am coming back to try and do that to the next generation of kids. That's so cool," adds the father of four young boys

After receiving his elementary education at Associated, Golombek spent Grade 9 in London, England, together with his family. He then returned to Toronto and graduated from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

It was there that he took the online career test, but after "playing with the variables" he realized he could combine his love of math with his love of kids by choosing teaching instead. He obtained a math and teaching degree from the University of Waterloo and then a Bachelor of Education from the University of Western Ontario.

Golombek then set off for the United States to be with his fiancée Adina, whom he met in Grade 3 at Associated. While she earned her PhD in chemistry, he honed his craft by teaching math, science and Jewish Studies "to every grade from kindergarten to first-year university," earning his Masters in Education on the side. He spent eight years at Pittsburgh's Solomon Schechter Day School, three of them as head of Jewish Studies. The family then headed to Israel for two years, where Golombek studied at the Melton Senior Educators Program and also earned a Masters in Jewish Education.

Finally, Toronto came calling and Golombek was offered the principal position and got started last September. He has been turning heads ever since with his fresh, energetic and enthusiastic approach to learning

For instance, Golombek organized the school's first Sukkah Sleepover, where students gathered for a night of singing, dancing and fun in the school sukkah. He has spearheaded lunchtime activities, including a school newspaper, and he's often found at student council meetings to gauge the kids' feelings on such topics as which balls are suitable to use at recess

Golombek has also initiated the Breakfast with the Principal program, in which small groups of parents meet with him over lox and bagels to "learn a bit of Talmud" and discuss their dreams for the school.

And his personal role in all this? "This is my chance to be the next link in this Associated tradition that goes back 98 years, both as a student and now as an educator," he says.

Canadians raise funds to help restore Jerusalem

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Jerusalem Foundation of Canada recently launched its campaign to raise funds for a $2-million project to restore Kikkar Zion, Jerusalem's central square.

"In the last five years or so, at the start of the Arab intifadah, the city has suffered a lot through terror attacks all over the city," Dan Meridor, former Israeli finance minister and now international chair of the Jerusalem Foundation, told The CJN just hours before he addressed about 60 guests at the launch, a private dinner at the Royal Bank Plaza in downtown Toronto.

"As a child, that is where I used to hang around, go to the shops and restaurants and the cinema," Meridor said, "and Kikkar Zion needs to be renovated. It is not in good condition. It needs renovations to become an attractive place."

Meridor said he hopes this initiative led by the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada president David Azrieli will help beautify the city and give an economic boost to the local establishments.

"There are many projects that are involved. The beautification of the city, cleaning it, helping the businesses in central town."

Kikkar Zion, or Zion Square, is located in the heart of Jerusalem, at the intersection of Ben-Yehuda Street and Jaffa Road.

"If we do it right, it might be a source of attraction to tourists, to see one of the beautiful things in Jerusalem. It will serve the tourists, it will serve the people of Jerusalem. The economy will benefit from this, the shops around, the restaurants around."

Meridor said they have approached architects and written proposals, but they still haven't made any final decisions about what will be done to restore the square.

Ian Leventhal, the Toronto-based executive director of the Jerusalem Foundation of Canada – an independent, non-partisan, community foundation that raises money to improve Jerusalem both physically and socially – said the money raised to revive the city square will also be used to offer services to troubled youth in the area.

"Not only is Kikkar Zion about bricks and mortar and restoration of the physical space, but we are also introducing a social component because of a lot of youth at risk that use the square," he said.

"The project is really two-pronged. It's about the physical improvements, but it is also about social services for young people who use the square," Leventhal added.

He compared Kikkar Zion to Toronto's Dundas Square or New York's Times Square, in that they are all tourist attractions, but also an area where troubled youth tend to congregate at night.

Meridor said that making improvements, both physically and socially, in a city as religiously diverse as Jerusalem is no easy feat.

"Jerusalem has a very diverse population. It is one-third Arab. Within the Jewish community, it is partly ultra-Orthodox and the rest are secular or modern Orthodox. To maintain Jerusalem as a western, open city doesn't come by itself. You have to work for it. It is a modern city on an ancient foundation."

Meridor said the foundation has raised more than a billion dollars internationally for Jerusalem since it was established in 1966.

"The foundation doesn't just collect money from people. It offers projects in Jerusalem that are of interest to the people. This is how we operate. The main thrust of the foundation changes based on the needs of Jerusalem," Meridor said.

Slavery lives, and we must end it

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

Shmot, the Book of Exodus, wraps itself thoroughly around the story of our ancestors leaving slavery and receiving the Torah. The experience of slavery hangs over every part of Exodus, except for three parshiot: Trumah, and Vayakhel-Pekudei. We read the latter this week.

Why don't these Torah portions mention Egypt? All three concern themselves with the decoration of the wilderness sanctuary. They are filled with every detail of gold and onyx, purple and scarlet, ark cover and screen, and so on. The careful planning, designing and accounting that the sanctuary required took up every spare moment of thought while the work was underway. There was no time to think about Egypt.

In short, when we're busy with the details of life, we have no time to think about our experience as slaves. It's probably during this week or next that it will dawn on most of us that Pesach is coming, and immediately, like the Israelites dealing with the details of Vayakhel-Pekudei, we will begin to fixate on the fine points of preparing for Passover. We think about seder guest lists, food, cleaning up chametz, dishes, and much more. The details are overwhelming, yet during all the preparation, we don't think about Egypt. We don't think about the fact we were slaves and what that awareness should awaken within us.

But right now, slaves are crossing into Israel from Egypt – not former slaves, but real ones, undocumented women who were held captive after leaving their homes in eastern Europe, and who were sold into slavery and trafficked by Bedouin across the border that Israel shares with Egypt. In Israel, they will be used as sex workers, abused until they are cast aside, then perhaps shipped home to Ukraine or elsewhere by the authorities.

Rabbi Levi Lauer founded ATZUM to end this slave trade, and he is gradually getting the Israeli government to clamp down on the border with Egypt so as to take Israel off the long list of nations in which human trafficking can happen.

We must do the same in Canada. Some 2,000 people are trafficked each year from Canada into the United States for the purposes of exploitation. We were slaves in Egypt. We know the heart and the hurt of the slave and the stranger. But even though we're only a few weeks from Passover, we get too busy with the details of daily life and the many nuances of holiday preparation to let our experience in Egypt influence us to think about an issue that affects between 700,000 to 2,000,000 enslaved human beings annually.

As Jews, we cannot close our eyes to slavery. We must become aware of its existence. We must urge our government to end slavery completely. We must learn how to bring it to an end, because it is a bitter, inhumane institution, and we must oppose it with every fibre of our Jewish being.

For this year's seder, I'm advocating that we add an extra portion of bitter herbs. After maror and after korech, the "Hillel sandwich," prepare a small piece of matzah with maror and say: "In remembrance of today's slaves, millions of people trafficked each year, now, in our own time, some in our very own country, we eat this extra portion of maror. We remember women entrapped by criminals who promised them a better life abroad. We think of children sold into slavery who knot carpets or tend crops at this moment. We recall refugee men swept into captive labour. With this extra maror, we who are free share the bitter lot of today's slaves, and we resolve to appeal to governments, leaders and communities to end human trafficking for all time."

Vayakhel-Pekudei doesn't mention Egypt because it's too busy with the small details of worship. But Jews must never forget that we were slaves in the land of Egypt, and we must act to end slavery for all time.

Rabbi Lerner is spiritual leader at Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom in Montreal.

Is there such a thing as the wicked child?

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Attitudes towards the "rasha," the wicked son of the Haggadah, reveal a great deal about the interpreter's view of education and his or her ability to imagine redemption for those currently lost from the path of Judaism. Is such a child to be shunned, unfit company for the "purer souls" around the table? Or can he or she be invited back into the Jewish conversation? And whose fault is it that this child became so alienated in the first place?

For Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch, writing in 19th-century Germany in the context of widespread defections from tradition engendered by the Enlightenment and Emancipation, the response to the wicked son is caustic and unequivocal. Derisively equating this child with the "progressive" son of modernity, Rabbi Hirsch poses and answers a rhetorical question of his own: "What should be said to the members of this fallen generation who, in their apostasy, fancy themselves to be the 'progressives' and deride the loyal elders as 'backward?' To them nothing should be said!"

Rabbi Hirsch understands this child's discourse to be grounded in mockery and views dialogue with such a son as impossible, and even counterproductive. But in an opposite tack, Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach predictably – urges a far different approach. Speculating on why certain children are a little "off," Rabbi Carlebach asserts, "Because there wasn't anybody to believe in them. It's so easy to get off the highway when nobody believes in you… Who do you think the wicked son is? Someone who was never told how holy he is." In subsequent comments in the Carlebach Haggadah, Rabbi Carlebach advises us to bring out the child's "inner nature," the deeply embedded Jewish soul that yearns for connection with his heritage.

Between Hirschian caution and Carlebachian optimism lies the fact that no child can be generically assessed – each person's story is unique. This is the ultimate message of the late Rebbe of Piaseczno, Rabbi Kalonymus Kalman Shapira, in his deeply insightful pamphlet on education A Student's Obligation. His words, published in 1932 in Poland, ring as true today as the day they were written. Rabbi Shapira focuses on the roots of the problem and emphatically denies that all blame can be laid at the child's doorstep. "Are we really devoid of responsibility, we, the older generation, their educators?" he asks. "And if we truly want to return to God and straighten out what we have made crooked, we must acknowledge our own share of guilt. For even if they are flawed in a way that previous generations of young people were not, this does not justify our neglecting them, our failure to investigate and discover the source of their soul-sickness while they are still young."

The child psychoanalyst D.W. Winnicott was famously quoted as saying that there is "no such thing as a baby." What he meant is that from the moment of birth, a baby is involved in a reciprocal interaction with its mother, and it's this interaction that is constantly helping to form the child's identity.

It's along these lines that Rabbi Shapira's remarks can be understood. There is, as it were, "no such thing as a rasha" – a child's Jewish disenchantment has partially sprung from his or her parental and educational interactions, and can hopefully be rerouted with enough time, patience, intelligence and love.

Jewish Life

An intellectual among Cossacks

Savage Shorthand: The Life and Death of Isaac Babel* by Jerome Charyn, Random House.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The story of Isaac Babel's death is now quite clear. On Jan. 26, 1940, his "trial" took place in Soviet secret-police chief Lavrenty Beria's office at Butyrki prison. It lasted only 20 minutes.

The judges withdrew and didn't even bother to deliberate: the verdict was prepared long before this little danse macabre. Babel was declared an agent of the French and Austrian intelligence services, "linked to the wife of the enemy of the people Yezhov," and the court sentenced him to death. Thus ended the life and career of a highly gifted Soviet Jewish short-story writer and dramatist (1894-1941).

Jerome Charyn's superb portrait of Babel penetrates the layers of mythology surrounding this magnificent artist some of it created by Babel's murderers, much more by Babel himself.

Babel was nurtured in the cosmopolitan atmosphere of Odessa, a thriving centre of Hebrew and Yiddish literature. The family was well assimilated but insisted he have a Jewish education at home. Barred from university in Odessa, Babel studied economics and commercial studies in Kiev from 1911.

There, in 1913, he published his first short story, Old Shloime, which tells of an old man's suicide against the background of expulsion of Jews and pressure to convert. All Babel's work bears the mark of his intense Jewish sensibility and the impressions of Russian anti-Semitism, tinged with his ironic sense of humour.

The masterpiece that brought him to fame was Red Cavalry, based on his experiences as a war correspondent on the Soviet-Polish front in 1920. These harrowing stories portray Kirill Lyutov, a Jewish intellectual among Cossack warriors. He is caught between his faith in the Communist future and the bloody destruction of the revolutionary war, between sensual Cossacks and his identity as a Jew with spectacles, unable to sever his nostalgic roots in the dying Jewish past.

These stories first appeared in Odessa in 1923 and their publication in Moscow literary journals in 1923-5 caused a sensation. Semyon Budenny, commander of the First Red Cavalry, issued a wrathful denunciation, but the writer Maxim Gorky later defended Babel from attacks on the ideological position of the author.

Benya Krik (1926) contains a hilarious series of Babel's short stories about Odessa Jewish gangsters before the Revolution and during the first years of Soviet rule. The antics of Benya "The King" reflect an unashamed Jewish pride and joie de vivre, as well as a delight in action that contrasts with the stammering bespectacled intellectual.

In these tales of Cossack marauders and flashy Odessa gangsters, Babel perfectly captured the raw, edgy mood of the first years of the Russian Revolution. Overnight he was a celebrity with throngs of admirers and a train of lovers.

With the rise of Stalin, Babel became a living ghost. Charyn brilliantly evokes the paranoid shadowland of the first wave of Stalin's terror, when agents of the Cheka snuffed out artists like candle flames. Charyn's chilling account of the circumstances of Babel's death – hidden and lied about for decades by Stalin's agents – finally sets the record straight.

Though it traces the arc of Babel's charmed life and mysterious death, Savage Shorthand bursts the confines of straight biography to become a meditation on the pleasures, torments, and meanings of Babel's art and many-sided personality.

Charyn, the esteemed author of more than 30 books, has written a clear-sighted and eloquent brief account of a brilliant writer against the background of a turbulent era in modern history.

Israeli elections, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The March 28 vote in Israel will mark the fifth set of elections since the Internet first became an important political tool in that country. Not surprisingly, with each election, the party sites become more sophisticated and multilingual. All sites are available in Hebrew, with many in Arabic, Russian, Amharic and English.

First, a word about all that English. Immigrants from English-speaking countries may be outnumbered by Russian olim, who represent one-sixth of the Israeli population, but many of the parties feel the "Anglos" are worth courting. Aryeh Green headed Natan Sharansky's Yisrael Ba'aliya party's effort to get the English vote in 2003. He explained to the Jerusalem Post that that population is worth the effort because they are more politically active than other members of society. "Just like Jews are wooed in American politics, the Anglos are the Jews of the Israeli electorate," Green said. "Anglos are educated voters who make a point of reading the parties' platforms. I'm surprised that the parties aren't wooing the Anglos more aggressively." [http://tinyurl.com/fsc6b]

Space doesn't permit me to list all the political parties running for Knesset. However, the Israel Government Portal [http://tinyurl.com/ket9w] and MavenSearch [http://tiny url.com/orf6w] have gathered links to most of the official party websites. Websites with an English presence including Balad, Herut, Kadima, Labor, Likud, Maki, Meretz-Yachad, Moledet and National Union.

A couple of observations. Although the religious party Shas had a web presence in the 2003 election, it went out of its way to emphasize that it was an unofficial website. It seems that Shas has bowed to the pressures of the web and now has its own official (Hebrew only) website. [www.shasnet.org.il] And for the first time, the Aleh Yarok (Green Leaf) Party has an English presence on the web. Its platform combines civil rights, personal freedom, ecology – and the legalization of cannabis. The Jerusalem Report pointed out, in 2003, that "Aleh Yarok garnered 34,000 votes, around one per cent of votes cast." [http://tinyurl.com/r9k79]

The Knesset also maintains a large English section that provides an interesting historical perspective to the election. In Israel's first election in 1949, there were just over half a million eligible voters. This month, more than five million Israelis are eligible to vote. In 1949, approximately 87 per cent of eligible voters actually decided to vote. That number has been declining steadily with only about 69 per cent bothering to vote in the last elections in 2003. [http://tinyurl.com/f8zqd]

Since the creation of the state, the names of Israel's political parties have been an alphabet soup of acronyms in which one letter can spell the difference between two different political philosophies. To help you distinguish Mapai from Mapam and to see how the various parties have merged and morphed over the years, I recommend the brief overviews at the Jewish Virtual Library. [http://tinyurl.com/f6fmm]

So many parties. So many promises. David Albert, a doctoral candidate at the department of government at University of Texas-Austin, has created A Guide to the Perplexed – Israeli Elections 2006, a synopsis of the parties and where they fall on the political spectrum. Albert is a member of Brit Tzedek v'Shalom, the Jewish Alliance for Justice and Peace. [http://tinyurl.com/f7864]

If after examining the platforms of all the existing parties, you don't find one to your liking, why not start your own? The Israel Government Portal provides the instructions for its citizens. The steps include:

- Finding 100 or more Israeli citizens to register the party;
- Electing a leader;
- Submitting some paperwork;
- Paying a registration fee; and publicizing yourselves.

Congratulations! You are now ready for the rough and tumble of Israel politics. [http://tinyurl.com/zg8m8]

Teacher of Excellence Awards

The mediocre teacher tells.
The good teacher explains.
The superior teacher demonstrates.
The great teacher inspires.

-William Arthur Ward-

We are a group of appreciative parents and citizens who are committed to learning. We believe that curiosity and the desire to learn are inspired at an early age in many places. In order to encourage and recognize learning and excellence in our schools, we will salute ten inspirational Jewish Day School teachers each year in the City of Toronto, with ten $1,000 Teacher of Excellence Awards.

We are looking for teachers who consistently demonstrate

- Excellence - motivating students to achieve their best
- Integrity - consistently thinking, saying and doing what is right
- Respect - treating each student as valuable and full of potential
- Innovation - inspiring students to explore and make choices

Do you know a teacher in a Toronto Jewish Day School who inspired you or someone you know? We invite parents, grandparents, students, former students, school administrators and colleagues to nominate that teacher for a Teacher of Excellence award.

Please visit our web site at www.teacherawards.org to share with us the reasons why your teacher is deserving of a Teacher of Excellence award. Nomination forms may also be requested by phoning 519-621-3620 x2210. Deadline is April 26, 2006.

New shul close to the Village

The centre has acquired a half-acre of land a few streets south of its current location, near Spadina and Heath Street, where three old houses now stand.

"It's so important to be close to the Village, where people shop," Kaplan said. "Coming to shul should be an easy thing to do."

The centre is halfway to the $10 million needed to build the new shul, and members hope the upcoming dinner will raise awareness and bring in support from the broader community.

Funding for the site came from Albert Latner – the centre is named for his late wife, Temmy – as well as Max and Gianna Glassman and the Tanenbaum family.

Kaplan said the centre hopes to inaugurate its new building on Rosh Hashanah in 2008.

Members say the centre is a prime reason many young Jewish families are moving to the area. "Young couples feel a sense of ownership," Rabbi Karfunkel said.

"I feel so blessed to be in this neighbourhood," he added. "I see the centre as a spiritual generator – plug in as you see fit."

There's even symbiosis with nearby businesses: disposable coffee cups used by the shul are donated by the Starbucks downstairs, perhaps in gratitude for the synagogue's drowsy 6 a.m. Torah learners – about 30 on a typical weekday.

The shul is traditional, but many members wouldn't categorize themselves as Orthodox.

Rabbi Karfunkel said that when he walks to shul on Shabbat, "10 cars pass me saying, 'Good Shabbos, Rabbi.'"

To him, this makes a profound statement. "By saying 'Good Shabbos,' they're saying, 'I'm with you,'" he said.

"There are lots of converts, couples who are intermarried," he said. "This is a Jewish living centre where people of any background and level of [Jewish] education can experience Judaism in many forms."

Though services are lively and spiritual "It's a serious minyan, but with lots of humour; it feels like everybody's having fun," Rifky said – there's a range of other Jewish choices, including a nursery, a Hebrew school, study missions to Israel, a community picnic in the park, even a baseball team – the Forest Hillbillies. "We're as good as the name sounds," Rabbi Karfunkel joked.

Kaufman credits the rabbi and his wife for the congregation's welcoming atmosphere. "People love talking with them… they're very good at making people feel very good."

The centre hopes to keep this heimishe feeling as it increases in size.

"We're going to grow, but stay small," Kaplan said. "The community would come in greater numbers if we give them space to do so."

HESCHEL HOLIDAY FUN

Toronto Heschel School students celebrated Purim with megillah readings and festivities at both campuses. Children came to school in costume and exchanged mishloach manot provided by the school's chevrah committee.

MEGILLAH READING: Rabbis Zalman Aaron Grossbaum, left, and Moshe Spalter of Chabad Lubavitch held a lunchtime megillah reading on Purim at Toronto City Hall. Some 100 people who work in the downtown core gathered in the council chambers to hear them, and to distribute mishloach manot and matanot le'evyonim.

Work of chevrah kadishah recognized in Adar

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Once a year, on the seventh day of Adar, the work of the chevrah kadishah – the people who prepare the body of the deceased for Jewish burial – is recognized with both fasting and celebration.

"It's a very auspicious day," says Jettie Schochet of the Toronto Women's Chevra Kadisha, which primarily serves the Orthodox community here.

Considered both the birthday and yahrzeit of Moses, the seventh of Adar – usually known as "Zayin Adar," zayin, is the seventh letter of the Hebrew alphabet – includes both a fast for chevrah members worldwide and a festive dinner. Because of calendar timing, the seventh of Adar never occurs on Shabbat. In a leap year, it is observed in the second Adar.

Before leaving Egypt, a midrash says, while most Jews were lining their pockets with Egyptian gold and silver, Moses personally ensured that Joseph's remains would be carried into Israel. For this, it is said, when Moses died alone, God took it upon himself to perform his burial.

On the day of Moses' death, chevrah members fast from sunrise to sunset to ask forgiveness for inadvertent violation of the dignity of the deceased.

In addition, after every individual taharah (purification) throughout the year, chevrah kadishah members personally beg forgiveness of the deceased, addressing them by name. "Once the body's in the coffin we ask for mechilah [forgiveness]," Schochet says.

When she gets a call that a woman has died, Schochet arranges for four or five members to meet at one of the city's two funeral chapels. "With the men, each shul has its own men's chevrah," Schochet says, but the women's chevrah is centrally organized, with about 40 active volunteers.

Every step in the process of preparing the body is done with dignity wherever possible.

"Those beautiful Jews," Rabbi Jacob Neusner, an American professor of religion, once wrote of an encounter with chevrah kadishah, "showed me more of what it means to be a Jew, of what Torah stands for, than all the books I ever read. They tended the corpse gently and reverently, yet did not pretend it was other than a corpse."

Most members are volunteers

The body is never alone; a shomer (guardian) remains at its side, reading Psalms. As soon as possible, the chevrah kadishah members perform taharah, purification. They bathe the body and dress it in tachrichim (wraps), plain hand-sewn white garments: pants, shirt, cap and veil. Washing and dressing are done with the same care one might offer a newborn.

Most chevrah members, Schochet says, volunteer because a parent or grandparent did so, or join following the loss of a parent or spouse. Formerly, only women beyond childbearing joined, but younger women now also participate. "They feel it's a tremendous mitzvah… the last mitzvah one can do for the lady who passed away."

There are many rules for maintaining dignity while washing and dressing: the body is never placed face-down; nothing is passed across it. And during preparations, each part is cleansed separately, keeping the rest, particularly the face, covered as much as possible. The procedure takes about an hour, and it's done with as little talking as possible – this isn't a time for idle chatter.

Although chevrah volunteers don't expect thanks, it is possible to find out who performed a taharah for a loved one. And Schochet says chevrah members can ask to be called to perform a taharah for a friend or family member if the need arises. "I've done that myself with somebody I was very close with."

Yet the work of the chevrah kadishah goes largely unacknowledged; it's often referred to as chessed shel emet (true kindness) – that which can never be repaid.

"Some people can't take it," Schochet says of the emotional demands. "I'm extremely proud of them. They are a very, very special group of ladies."

Some have served for 35 years or more, she says.

The link with the month of Adar may still seem obscure. A popular saying goes, "When Adar arrives, joy increases." This would seem to make it an unusual time to acknowledge the chevrah's work.

But there's another connection between Adar and the chevrah kadishah. The word tachrichim refers to the white garments place on the body, and are sometimes compared to the priestly royal robes.

However, the word also appears near the end of Megillat Esther, read during Adar on Purim. Following Mordechai's victory over Haman, he goes out in a "tachrich," a royal garment of fine purple linen.

Mourning rituals elevate the deceased beyond what they could attain in life. In life, we may be rich or poor, scholarly or ignorant; in death, through Jewish ritual, we all become equal – precious royalty before the King of Kings.

High school students urge community to 'eat for Israel'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

High school students at Ulpanat Orot have gotten on board a project initiated last year by their counterparts at a Baltimore Jewish high school to raise money for Israeli victims of terror.

America Eats for Israel (www.americaeatsforisrael.org) raised $27,800 (US) last year by enlisting 135 kosher restaurants in the United States to donate 10 per cent of their gross revenues for one day.

This year, on Monday, March 27, four Toronto area restaurants are taking part in the fundraiser: Bais Burger, Joe Bou's Cookoos, King Kosher Pizza and Marky's, said Miryam Spiegel, 17, a Grade 12 student at Ulpana who is co-chairing the project with classmates Tali Magder and Rachel Boussiban.

Funds raised will be donated to Almagor - Terror Victims Association, One Family Fund and the Koby Mandell Foundation.

As of last week, the school was looking into a way to facilitate lunch orders for its 130 students, and organizers have been calling other schools to urge them to do the same, said Spiegel, who became involved through an American friend she knew from a B'nai Akivah summer program she had attended.

"We thought it was such an amazing way to help Israel," she said. "We thought it was a good way for the community to come together in such an easy way."

Ulpana students have been active in chesed work, including community service and raising money for Israel, she noted. "It was pretty much a natural thing to get involved in something like this. We would encourage everyone to come out [to participating kosher restaurants] and help us."

Mollie Sharfman, a project co-ordinator and Grade 12 student at the religious Zionist school Yeshivat Rambam of Baltimore, where the project originated, said that last year some people had three or four meals out that day.

The school brought in waffles and omelettes for breakfast, and pizza for lunch. Later, she said, she went out for Chinese food.

"You could feel the energy. Everyone felt connected."

More than 40 local high schools are taking part in the event.

Markham Chabad set to expand

In response to increased enrolment in its preschool and youth programs, Chabad Lubavitch of Markham recently began building a new youth wing.

The nine-year-old, 12,000-square-foot building is located on Green Lane just east of Bayview Avenue in Thornhill. The new construction project is expected to be completed before the summer.

The expansion will create more space for Torah Tots Preschool and Chabad youth programs. Torah Tots has an enrolment of 140 children, as does its summer camp counterpart called Kindercamp.

School director Goldie Plotkin said that the "phone just doesn't stop ringing with new applicants for the coming school year."

There are now a dozen Chabad youth programs on site, including two new groups for post-bar and bat mitzvah children, Plotkin said. Other programs include Shabbatots (a program for preschoolers), a junior congregation and Torah for Teens.

The expansion of approximately 3,000 square feet will include new classrooms, an indoor gym and more office and storage space.

The new space is being built with a grant from York Region as well as private donations. Also, some materials and services have been donated, Plotkin said. Costs above and beyond that will be approximately $150,000, she added.

"I believe that we will outgrow this space in no time at all," said Rabbi Avraham Plotkin, the congregation's spiritual leader and executive director.

Hillel reps explore the 'millennial generation' at CJN Roundtable

Each winter, The CJN holds a Roundtable discussion where our editorial advisory board discusses a specific and timely subject with invited members of the Jewish community who have a stake in the issue.

This year's Roundtable was held Feb. 28. The subject was how to respond to Jewish "millennials," a term that describes young people who started university after 2000 and who feel some Jewish identity but are generally disconnected from and uninvolved with "establishment" organizations.

– The editor

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

They are better educated, and they can talk on the phone, listen to music, search the Internet and watch television all at the same time.

They are the "millennial generation," and they're the future of the Jewish community in North America.

The "millennials," as they're called, took centre stage at this year's CJN Roundtable, held recently at the offices of the Toronto law firm Goodman and Carr, as Zac Kaye, executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto and a member of The CJN's editorial advisory board, and Hillel associate executive director Stephanie Krasman presented the findings of a Hillel International study about Jewish students in the United States.

"Millennials" are defined as people who were born between 1982 and 2002 and are so called because they likely began post-secondary education in the year 2000 or later.

"They are more affluent, better educated and more diverse that any other generation in recent memory. They are hyper-communicators, so they are always on their cellphones, the Internet, the e-mail," Krasman said.

"They are all multi-taskers. They can do a variety of technical things at once, like watch TV, talk on the phone and search the net."

An invitation to take part in the survey was sent by e-mail last April to 500,000 American university students aged 18 to 26. Some 20,000 students responded, of whom 650 identified themselves as Jewish. Only those who identified as Jews were asked to finish the questionnaire, Krasman said.

Participants were classfied into three groups. Based on questions about their Jewish behaviour, identity and affiliation, they were placed, using a points system, into either the high-, middle-, or low-identification groups.

"High" students are those who walk into Hillel offices on their own, are eager to become involved and have been involved in the Jewish community in the past, Krasman said.

The "middles" are less likely to show up at a Hillel event, unless it is a social one, and the "lows" are classified as "on the fringe."

Twenty-eight per cent of respondents were classfied as high, 32 per cent as middle and 40 per cent as low.

The results were American, but Kaye said he believes the Canadian experience is very similar.

He said Hillel is in the process of doing a Canadian study and hopes to have the results by the end of this month.

Hillel has e-mailed surveys to more than 100,000 university-age students across Canada, but he and Krasman predict most respondents will be from Toronto.

During their presentation, Kaye and Krasman detailed seven core traits of most Jewish students in the millennial generation.

As this generation has become more and more preoccupied with performing well in school, it seems Jewish activity has taken a back seat

• They believe they are special in that they have high expectations, and feel they deserve the best education and a great job.

• They are sheltered in that their parents, dubbed "helicopter parents," hover over their lives and are the main players in their decision-making.

• They are confident in that they believe they have unlimited possibilities and opportunities.

• They are team-oriented in that they like group work, are motivated by conformity and socialize in like-minded groups.

• They are conventional in that they embrace their parents' values, and they behave and dress well.

• They feel pressured to get good grades and get into good schools.

• They are high-achieving in that they expect accountability and rewards for hard work. They also have the highest SAT scores of any generation in U.S. history.

But as this generation has become more and more preoccupied with performing well in school, it seems Jewish activity has taken a back seat.

"What we are seeing here in the study, and what we think we will see here in Canada, is that today, people see Judaism as a choice," Kaye said.

"The issue surrounding Hillel is that over the last 10 years, I have seen a movement toward the acceptance of the idea of Jews by choice. [The millennials] choose to 'do Jewish' according to how they feel comfortable," he added.

About half the U.S. respondents identified themselves as ethnically, rather than religiously, Jewish, but students are still proud of being Jewish and are willing to publicly identify as Jews, Krasman said.

Stephanie Krasman and Zac Kaye present the findings of the millennial study.

Millennials show a strong interest in issues related to the Holocaust, but are only mildly interested in Israel advocacy, Krasman said. Indeed, advocacy on behalf of Israel received the lowest rating among the choices for campus activities. Tikkun olam, mending the world, the metaphor for social action, was a consistently high motivator for students who responded to the questionnaire.

Hillel international has chosen to focus its efforts on the "middles" and work at making Hillel more of a welcoming, inclusive environment that will encourage Jewish students to become more involved, Krasman said.

"The most significant way that Hillel can increase its appeal and broaden its reach is to make it seem more welcoming. This was the major key finding. Of the top five values students are looking for in Hillel, four are about making Hillel more welcoming," she added.

Hillel International's vision is to inspire every Jewish student to make a commitment to Jewish life, she said.

"In pursuit of this mission, Hillel is committed to creating a pluralistic, welcoming and inclusive environment, fostering a student's growth as a balance in being instinctively Jewish but universally human at the same time, enforcing the importance of tzedek (social justice), tikun olam (repairing the world), Jewish learning and spirituality," Krasman said.

She and Kaye said they hope that this mission, one Hillel calls the "big hairy audacious goal," will double the number of students who have meaningful Jewish experiences while at university – ones that are interactive, pluralistic, distinctively Jewish, and self-worth affirming.

Krasman said that once Hillel of Greater Toronto receives the data from the Canadian survey, a strategic plan that's specific to this country will begin to take shape.

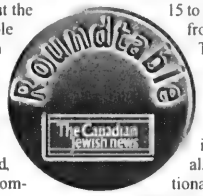
'Being Jewish is a pretty big thing'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Hillel International's recent study about the "millennial generation" has challenged the Jewish community to think about students who are minimally involved in Judaism, said Zac Kaye, executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

Speaking at the recent Canadian Jewish News roundtable discussion about the "millennials" – defined as people born after 1982 and who began post-secondary education in the year 2000 or later – Kaye said the Jewish community needs to think about the "middles and lows as much as the highs," referring to youth who are moderately involved, uninvolved or very involved in community life.



But the answers as to how to get people more involved are not clear cut, as York University student Noam Lockshin pointed out. Like others around the table, Lockshin suggested the study may reflect perennial differences between generations, which seem sharper when young people are in the questing, university-age stage of life, but become less sharp later in life.

Nevertheless, he cautioned that community groups must be careful not to dilute the Jewish content of their programming "in order to meet people where they are." He said the question becomes, "are we going to dilute our content, or are we going to cut out the people who probably will not be involved down the road anyway?" He urged a careful approach to answering that question.

University of Toronto student Elissa Zweig echoed Lockshin's observations about the study, but said she could not recognize herself in its observations about millennials.

Gary Siepser, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's senior vice-president of strategic community planning and engagement, agreed the results might be a reflection of broader generational issues. But he said reaching out to unaffiliated youth is part of a broader community problem, not restricted to campuses, being responsive to people who, for whatever reason, haven't found a place in established organizations.

Stephanie Krasman, associate director of Hillel of Greater Toronto, said that in order to attract students defined as "lows" in terms of Jewish self-identification, her organization tries to foster Jewish life on campus in a variety of ways.

"We know that not all students will come to a Shabbat dinner or a learning [session], but there are [other] ways to attract students. They may be interested in social action and volunteerism, arts and culture or outdoor adventure."

Students, though, need to be involved in their own programming, said Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah.

"Sometimes we put too much blame on leadership and shirk our own responsibility."

When community organizations try to offer something for everyone, he said, "[programming sometimes gets watered down], and that's not a model to adopt. Some things don't appeal to everyone. We have to appeal to different groups [in order] to cover more."

Surveys have shown that more students attend Jewish studies classes than take part in Hillel activities, said Andrea Most, an assistant professor of English who teaches a Jewish studies class at the University of Toronto.

Out of the 50 students in her class, she said, five have Jewish day school educations and 15 to 20 are not Jewish. "The rest come from the 'lows' and the 'middles.' They do not attend Hillel [programs], but they spend a year learning about Jewish literature.

"It is a complicated challenge to make sure that all students feel included. I don't simplify material, and I try to offer students additional resources. I don't dumb down the Jewishness."

Kaye said that Jewish studies classes attract large numbers of students, both Jewish and non-Jewish. "It is a revolution and Hillel has heralded it.

"Hillel is not the only player on campus. It is not an umbrella organization, it is a model. If [another] model is Jewish studies, then that is wonderful.

"Hillel understands that there are gateway opportunities. With Jewish studies, we are [allowing] non-Jews to learn about our culture and rich heritage. We are open to the idea that there are many gateways to Jewish life. Hillel is a gateway."

Hillel can't reach Jewish students on its own, he added.

"We can't have everything invested in one person. We need a team, and that includes Jewish studies. We don't have to berate ourselves that people don't come to Hillel. Hopefully, they'll find another outreach. The tragedy would be that there were no gateways. We have to invest in partnership and sharing."

When asked by CJN advisory board member Lou Ronson if Hillel's experience in Canada parallels the U.S. experience, Kaye responded that as time goes on, there are fewer and fewer differences.

"From a very early age, our young people imbibe the North American university culture, such as television, books, fashion and music. They transcend the [geographic] boundaries," Kaye said.

"The ideas they pick up are obviously informed by the Canadian experience, but there are many more similarities than differences."

Rabbi Tradburks said it's hard to imagine that students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto are similar to students from Los Angeles public schools.

Kaye responded that while day school graduates are among the "highs" as far as knowledge of Judaism and participation in Jewish life are concerned, "one of the challenges of our community is how we see [the story] unfold after day school. The day school system does tremendously positive things, but we don't necessarily see that on campus."

In terms of what can be done to achieve more involvement in Jewish affairs among a wider group of students, U of T graduate Susannah Dainow, 25, said Jewish student groups need people with basic communication skills. "They need to listen and be warm, and ensure that student leaders do the same thing. People cannot be controlled, but they get their cues from others."

Hillel must not only seem welcoming, she said, in reference to a statement in the Hillel International study, it has to be welcoming. "If you [only] seem welcoming, people will see through that. For me, Judaism has incredible duality. If it wasn't possible for me to carve out something individually, I wouldn't care. My group experience has been lackluster."

Aaron Kasman, a former president of the Jewish Students' Union at U of T, said personal interactions should never be compromised.

"There is no excuse to be rude to anyone. If they are rude, [they shouldn't] wonder where the young people are," he said.

"First impressions count so much, whether it is face-to-face, e-mail or on the telephone. First impressions attract people or send them away. If someone comes and does not feel welcome, what are the chances they'll come back?"

This is a cry that has been heard for years, Kaye said, "but we've not learned our lessons. The message is still the same. We erect barriers and we create difficulties in access. That is nothing new."

Susannah Dainow, right, discusses the issues. At left, Jessica Feldman pays attention as do Sandy Brown and Rabbi Michael Stroh across the table.

Former York University student Yoni Goldstein nudged the discussion past the boundaries of campus life and Hillel and pointed to the seeming reluctance of the Orthodox establishment in the Toronto area to accommodate any attempt at programmatic innovation, even when it's sought by Orthodox youth. It's very difficult, he said, for Orthodox youth to feel included and involved when their efforts at innovation within the framework of Orthodoxy are turned away.

A comment was made that if this was the case for Orthodox youth, how much more so might the observation apply for unaffiliated youth trying to find a home in the organized Jewish community?

Sandy Brown, a past president of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said Jewish leaders have a responsibility to keep the community alive. "While we are in the throes of planning for tomorrow and building institutions, [we have to worry about] who will fill these institutions."

Rabbi Michael Stroh, rabbi emeritus of Temple Har Zion, suggested that it's too easy to blame institutions for problems of Jewish continuity. Judaism and Jewish life, he said, have always needed institutions. "But where will the funding come from [to build them?] The university, as an example, is an institution and it needs funding. Values and knowledge are passed down by institutions, and if they don't exist, Judaism will wither."

In response, it was suggested that there is no question regarding the need for a community to rely on its institutions for growth and continuity, but rather about the way those institutions respond to the many diverse people beckoning at their doors, or to people who are reluctant to approach them.

Dainow said the community needs to find out why some people are "disengaged" from communal life. "We have to look at them as a group. Maybe they had a bad experience, or maybe their family was not involved. There are all kinds of reasons why people are not affiliated, and there is a huge risk of losing a lot of these people. The [people categorized as] 'lows' have to be considered. Being Jewish is a pretty big thing."

Echoing an earlier remark by Lockshin, former Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy suggested there are limits beyond which institutions such as Hillel should not compromise the Jewish content of its programming. At a certain point, he suggested, community organizations must ask themselves whether they lose more than they gain by sacrificing the core values of Jewish identity. He was referring to a pork roast that was held by a Hillel organization on an American campus to try to attract more students to its activities.

As way of increasing community involvement among Jewish students, Landy suggested that spending time in an organized manner in volunteer service could be rewarding. In terms of its wide Jewish diversity, he said Toronto was "a community of communities and there are so many expressions of Judaism in the city."

Summing up, CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat, who moderated the proceedings, said the following points emerged from the discussion:

- Although the study of the millennial generation was meant to provide a blueprint for Hillel International, its conclusions apply to all areas of Jewish life.
- All Jewish institutions should try to be as welcoming as possible. Warm personal interactions that are based on acceptance and sincerity are key.
- Homogeneity is not our objective, but the term "alternative," referring to different aspects of Jewish expression, carries negative connotations and should be avoided.
- "Being Jewish is a pretty big thing," as Susannah Dainow said. While we mustn't rush to dilute the core values that constitute being Jewish for most people, we must also try to reach out to as many people as possible and try to help establish and enhance the feeling, that indeed, being Jewish is a pretty big thing.

Context negates Jericho raid conspiracy theories

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Canadian media have recently focused significant attention on our military operations in Afghanistan, a focus intensified by Prime Minister Stephen Harper's surprise visit there early last week.

Even as the March 28 Knesset elections neared, relatively little media attention was paid to Israel. All that changed when news of an Israeli military operation at a Jericho, West Bank, prison broke on March 14.

The Canadian and international media were all over the story. After British and American soldiers assigned by international agreement to guard the accused assassin of an Israeli cabinet minister left their post, Israel launched an attack on the prison. The goal was to capture Ahmed Saadat, along with five other wanted members of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

BBC World (seen on CBC Newsworld) devoted the first 10 minutes of its March 14 news broadcast to the incident. Beyond reporting about the Israeli assault on the prison, the BBC dealt with other aspects of the story, including attacks on British facilities in Gaza and Ramallah by Palestinians who believed conspiracy-laden rumours – immediately denied by British Foreign Minister Jack Straw – that Britain and the United States had colluded with Israel on the prison raid.

The BBC also reported on the growing radicalization among Palestinians, who were kidnapping foreigners (albeit temporarily) and attacking European assets in the West Bank and Gaza.

On the BBC News website March 14, in an article titled "Jail raid reflects Mideast tensions," Middle East editor Jeremy Bowen described how the Palestinians until very recently saw the Europeans as being largely sympathetic to their cause.

But, Bowen wrote, "that attitude is changing. First there were the cartoons satirizing the Prophet Muhammad in a Danish newspaper, then the European Union joined a fairly frosty reaction to the results of the [PA] elections, and now this.

"Viewed from the perspective of a young Palestinian man, it must look as though the Europeans have joined the whole world that is against them."

Missing from the BBC report, however, was any real context about why the British and U.S. troops had suddenly (it seemed) abandoned their duty at the prison.

In her report for CTV's National News that evening, Janis Mackey Frayer explained that "Israel feared Saadat and five accomplices would be released." She added: "U.S. and British officials deny any collusion with Israel, insisting the monitors left because their security concerns were ignored."

Indeed, as the Globe and Mail's Mark MacKinnon wrote the following day, the British (and Americans) "sent [PA president Mahmoud] Abbas a letter on March 8 warning that the monitors could be withdrawn if security conditions didn't improve."

(The letter, signed jointly by the British and American officials – and available on the Internet – warned: "The pending handover of governmental power to a political party [Hamas] that has repeatedly called for the release of the Jericho detainees also calls into question the political sustainability of the monitoring mission." It concluded: "Regrettably, if the Palestinian Authority does not come into full compliance with the Jericho monitoring arrangements and make substantive improvements to the security of the U.S. and U.K. personnel working at the prison, or come to a new agreement with the Government of Israel, we will have to terminate our involvement with the Jericho monitoring arrangements and withdraw our monitors with immediate effect.")

Referring to remarks by Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mark Regev about the reasons for Israel's operation, MacKinnon noted not only that Hamas "which now controls the Palestinian parliament, had spoken about freeing the [PFLP] men" but also that "Abbas had indicated that he might not block their release." Then MacKinnon added: "Mr. Regev said that Israel had no choice but to take action once the U.S. and British monitors left."

Journalists who took the relevant context into account made British, U.S. and Israeli actions comprehensible, and also, inadvertently, exposed the anti-Palestinian conspiracy theory for what it is.

Countering Israel haters on campus

By JORDIE SAPERIA
Special the The CJN

Guest Voice

The University of Toronto has denied Hillel's request to remove the world "apartheid" from the name of the annual Israel-bashing week sponsored by the Arab Students' Collective, Israeli Apartheid Week.

Instead of complaining – like elementary students tattling to the teacher – to university officials about student groups using Israel and "apartheid" together, Jewish students ought to take their heads out of the sand.

So in the spirit of carrying on the Jewish tradition of proudly defending ourselves, I offer several pragmatic ways to counter Israeli Apartheid Week, which, as history has illustrated, will almost certainly make its way onto other Canadian university campuses.

For starters, why don't we bring out the best, brightest speakers who can eloquently articulate Israel's message? This will not only draw attention away from the destructive activities of groups such as the Arab Students' Collective, but it will also provide students, both Jewish and non-Jewish, with an opportunity to hear an alternative – and more positive – message.

Our community, thankfully, has great resources. Instead of channelling these valuable resources into fattening our already-bloated Jewish student bureaucracies, we could bring high-profile speakers to campus. That would use community funds effectively, too.

While our enemies focus on destruction, why don't we focus on celebrating all of Israel's accomplishments?

Let us hold a rally celebrating Israel, the lone, liberal democratic light in the dark and dictatorial Middle East. Why don't we initiate a massive publicity campaign promoting Israel's singularity as the sole country in the Middle East where people are granted the most basic political freedoms irrespective of race, religion, sexual orientation or gender?

Why don't we plaster this message on every wall in the university and in every campus newspaper, and make it heard on every campus radio station?

And if our enemies are really intent on placing "apartheid" on the campus agenda, let's celebrate the truth and our illustrious Jewish history of being at the vanguard of fighting for civil rights, marching hand in hand with black civil rights leaders against racism, slavery, and, yes, even apartheid.

Universities are – or, at least, are supposed to be – free marketplaces of ideas. Unfortunately, while our enemies are voicing views that are entirely antithetical to ours and are exercising their democratic rights, we sometimes forget to exercise ours.

Instead of rising to the challenge of vigorously defending our viewpoints with confidence, we routinely – and unsuccessfully – implore the authorities to protect us from being intimidated and offended. Complaining to the university is a waste of time. Worse, we are perceived as weak. We are handicapped by our own preoccupation with ensuring that our activities are given a hashgachah – a kosher stamp of approval – from university officials and other student groups.

It's time that we acknowledge that Israel's haters are not going to leave our campuses any time soon. Instead of cowering to the campus castigation of Israel and the Jewish people, let's hold our heads high and proudly wave the blue and white.

Finally, it is no secret that the overwhelming majority of Jewish students choose to remain unaffiliated on our university campuses. Jewish pride and Jewish identity will only be strengthened by standing up for our values, being proactive, and unapologetically celebrating the Jewish state and our Jewish heritage with good, old-fashioned Jewish courage and boldness.

Chazak chazak v'nitchazek!

Choosing a university: advice for parents

By JUDY LIBMAN
Special to The CJN

If you have a Grade 12 student living in your house, you've recently survived the stresses of university applications. Over the next few months, acceptance letters will be a source of pride for both of you. Often, though, this plunges teens into another round of anxious wondering: how does he/she decide which university offer to accept?

Students may not have fully investigated their options before the January application deadline. Left to their own devices, many teens resort to quick, simple ways to decide on a school. "All my friends are going to xxxxxx," "nobody from my school goes to yyyyyy," "the school with the most 'prestige' is the best" or "I want to be in downtown Montreal/Vancouver/wherever" may be given as reasons for choosing, or not choosing, a particular school.

In Canada, our publicly funded post-secondary system means there are few bad choices.

Your teen will soon receive an avalanche of mailings, invitations, e-mail newsletters and CD-ROMs from universities. Visits to campus are key. No student should ever accept an offer without having taken a real – not virtual – tour.

Your own university experiences may not provide up-to-date criteria for picking a school. Majors have changed, methods of instruction are new and competition has ramped up alarmingly in many programs. Academic support services may have been non-existent then; now they are a critical edge for many students.

So though you may be tempted to offer your well-meaning parental opinion, the moment the envelopes arrive, why not instead use this as a "teachable moment" in how to make a thoughtful, well-reasoned adult decision?

I often recommend to teens a simple yet powerful tool that assists them in critically evaluating their options. For each school or program under serious consideration, I suggest they make a three-column page with the headings "pluses," "minuses" and "need more information." Then they systematically list pros and cons of each option, and note what they don't yet know. That extra investigation is a key step, and it should be theirs – not yours – to do.

Next: the student goes back and rates each plus or minus (using an arbitrary scale out of 5 or 10) by asking: "How important is this item to me?" and "How important is this item to my parents?" This method uncovers hidden assumptions, and challenges teens to investigate and think. Your opinions will still weigh in, but in a way that encourages discussion and critical analysis.

Now let your teen lead a good evaluative discussion with you. Ask gently probing questions. Take the role of learner. Give your teen the same respect that you would a professional colleague – even one with whom you frequently disagree.

Teens like this method: it is systematic, and they appreciate having your respect, so they listen better to your guidance.

Following are some factors to consider when selecting a school:

• Does "prestige" matter? Some universities get more research funding and are therefore "prestigious" in a way that may have little impact on teaching. And though there may be a Nobel laureate on the faculty, will an undergrad ever run into him or her in a classroom?

Magazine rankings of schools are generally an attempt to quantify everything that is countable (number of books in the library, number of tenured professors, etc.). They are often not the best predictor of a student's qualitative experience.

• What's the best route to medical/law/professional school? It's not where you go – it's how you do that counts. Students should attend an undergraduate program that motivates them, interests them and actively supports their learning.

• Campus culture? Most Jewish students want to find at least some Jewish community on campus. It needn't be large; some excellent smaller universities have a close-knit and vibrant Jewish campus life. Some universities are highly politicized – will this be exciting, infuriating or irrelevant? What environment will be more motivating – competitive or collaborative? Students with special learning needs must investigate the nature of academic support services.

• Maturity? Parents: be honest. If you think your teen is still immature and somewhat irresponsible, do not let them go to a "party school." The prevalence of substance abuse is no joke. Even students who can handle peer pressure still have to contend with noisy, drunken residence mates.

• Can students take some small classes? Look for a "first year seminar" offering. Students in these courses interact more, learn to ask questions, to present an argument and to think critically.

• Do students need to commit to a major right away? About 50 per cent of all students in university end up changing or modifying their original major. Many majors (and careers!) are not familiar to students coming from high school, so an inflexible program limits the potential for discovery.

• Are professors approachable? Some campuses nurture and encourage this; others don't. The most successful students get to know at least one professor every year. These students feel more connected with the institution and with their program of study; they stand a better chance of snagging those hard-to-come-by summer research jobs; they have a ready source of advice and support. On the practical side, they will also have four letters of reference!

Pioneering Ethiopian Jew shares his story

By LISA VARANO
Special to The CJN

Baruch Tegegne is clear about his identity.

"I know who I am," he told an audience of about 65 McGill University students last month.

"I am black and a Jew."

To cap off Black History Month celebrations, the Black Students' Network and Hillel teamed up for The Colours of Judaism, an event about the Ethiopian Jewish experience.

It was proposed by Miriam Aronowicz, a McGill student who sits on the university's senate subcommittee on race and ethnic relations.

"It's always interested me – the concept of Jewish identity and the multi-faceted nature of what it means to be Jewish," she said. "The idea came about [on senate] that students should work cross-culturally and across different racial and ethnic groups to put together events, and we thought the Ethiopian Jewish experience was the perfect way to do this."

In 1956, when Tegegne was around 10 years old, he arrived in Israel for the first time. He was among 27 Ethiopian Jewish children brought to Israel by the government to receive an education. Many in Israeli society were surprised to learn that there were Jews in Ethiopia.

Baruch Tegegne

"In the beginning, it was very difficult," said Tegegne. "Somebody will ask me, 'How did you become a Jew?' For me, it's hard to give that answer. I will ask him the same question. I don't know if he knows himself."

Today 80,000 Ethiopian Jews live in Israel and few remain in Ethiopia. Many escaped from difficult conditions in Africa. Tegegne went to neighbouring Sudan in the 1980s to help Jews flee.

"I was the first man there rescuing the first people… then the Israeli forces, they come over to rescue the rest of the people."

Ethiopia's Jews had long been separated from the rest of the world's Jewish community.

"We thought, we are the only Jews left in the whole world," he said.

During his childhood, Ethiopian Jews were strictly observant and lived apart from Christians. The lack of communication with mainstream Judaism meant that the religious practices were kept "like in Moses' time," he said.

Over the long history of the Jews in Ethiopia, Tegegne said, most of the original 500,000 converted to Christianity.

Helen Eyob, Tegegne's niece, a student at Concordia University, said that in the face of discrimination in Addis Ababa, Ethiopia's capital, her parents were forced to keep their religion a secret. Her family moved to Canada when she was a child.

"As you get older, you have to try to negotiate your identity because you are black and you are Jewish, and you're trying to basically jump from one identity to the next, and trying to actually figure out where you fit in," said Eyob. "That's actually very difficult because you want to fit into every category 100 per cent and you realize you don't."

Unlike in Israel, the Ethiopian Jewish community in Montreal is very small. Eyob said perceptions differ accordingly.

"Outside of Israel, people don't see you as Ethiopian. They see you as black," she said. "I'm black, so that's what I certainly see myself as first because it's how I think people perceive me, but I'm very much Jewish."

The Colours of Judaism provided the opportunity for both the black and Jewish communities at McGill to learn from each other, said Donald Erskine, chief of the Black Students' Network.

Yiddish instructor teaches students about their roots

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Shaun Bernstein, a first-year York University student majoring in professional writing, proved that you don't have to be a Jewish studies scholar to enjoy a good Yiddish lesson.

"I have always had a passion for the language and the culture. [Learning to speak Yiddish] was always something I wanted to do," the 18-year-old said. "I like the whole old-school aspect of it."

The course is intended for beginners, and the instructor assumes that not everyone taking it is Jewish or has a Hebrew language background.

Bernstein was one of the students who had to learn the Hebrew alphabet, which, he said, put him at a bit of a disadvantage, but it didn't discourage him.

Now he can converse in Yiddish, albeit slowly, he added.

Bernstein said he realizes some may think that Yiddish is not the most practical course to take because there aren't many ways to apply the knowledge in the working world, but he had always wanted to learn the language.

"It's a fantastic course – something I would have done one way or the other. But the opportunity arose and I jumped on it."

Gloria Brumer, the Yiddish instructor to eight students, said she introduces her class to both oral and written Yiddish, and also makes a point of incorporating music into the four-hour-a-week course.

"If we talk about work, food, relationships, lots of music goes with that. Music is an important component of the course," Brumer said.

The course material also includes Yiddish poetry, prose and folklore.

"For some people, this course takes us back to our roots. It explains where we came from and even the way we think."

Brumer said Yiddish also introduces Jewish European history to students, adding that you don't have to be Jewish to be interested in the historical aspect of the course.

This is the second year the beginner Yiddish course has run, and Brumer said she has "every hope and expectation that it'll continue."

As for creating a second-level Yiddish course, Brumer said that was the intent all along. As long as there are students who want to take the course, it will be available to them, she added.

She said one of the challenges is getting students to take the course early in their academic career because the longer one has been in a program, the less flexibility one has to choose elective courses.

Of the eight students in Brumer's class, most are either graduating or close to graduating, and even if they were interested in an intermediate course, they might not have the time to take it.

Bernstein said his impression is that none of the eight students in the class plans on taking a second-level Yiddish course.

Shira Zeliger, 22, a fourth-year Jewish teacher education student, said she enrolled in the Yiddish course because she plans to continue in Jewish studies at a graduate level and wants to focus on Jewish history.

She feels it would be a major advantage for someone studying Jewish history at a graduate level to be familiar with Yiddish.

Zeliger, who went to Bialik Day School where she learned Yiddish from grades 3 to 8, said studying Yiddish was also important to her Jewish identity, as her grandparents speak the language and it is her father's first language.

"It is part of our Jewish culture. People aren't seeing the importance of studying it."

While some may think that learning Yiddish isn't useful, Bernstein said the best part about the course is being able to have a conversation in Yiddish with his grandfather.

"My grandparents are incredibly proud of me. My parents are proud of me too, but they think I'm wasting my time," Bernstein said. "But, I've gotten a kick out of it. I'll defend it to the grave."

"I would encourage students to consider taking Yiddish," Zeliger said. "People will find that although it may be a dying language, it is an important one."

Hillel urging students to vote in CSU elections

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Hillel Montreal president Jason Portnoy is strongly urging students at Concordia University not to be lulled into complacency by the calm that has prevailed on campus the past couple of years but to vote in the Concordia Student Union (CSU) elections March 28 to 30.

Hillel is all but officially endorsing the slate called Experience, which it sees as the natural successor to the Evolution group that has been in office for three years. Portnoy credits the moderate Evolution with being largely responsible for ending the tension at Concordia, which reached its height in 2002-2003 after the anti-Netanyahu protest.

The CSU executive and much of the council was then dominated by highly politicized left-wing factions, which critics considered anarchist and anti-Israel.

"Evolution has done an incredible job of turning around the campus from the chaos of three years ago and they have shown they are for all the students. I'd like to see that continue," said Portnoy, a fourth-year Concordia student.

Portnoy is concerned that students have become apathetic because things have been going so well that they won't bother to vote. Turnout is traditionally very low for the CSU elections – around 10 per cent. It was up somewhat for a couple of years after the Netanyahu controversy, and slid again last year.

The rise of the radicals within the CSU has been attributed to its ability to get out a core of students who are more politically minded. The CSU represents the 26,000 undergraduates at the university.

Portnoy said Hillel has been able to work well with the CSU, whose current president is Mohamed Shuriye, organizing activities designed to promote outreach and co-operation with other campus clubs, including Muslim and Arab groups.

"Hillel has become proactive instead of reactive in the past couple of years. We have made new allies on campus," Portnoy said.

Hillel's funding from the CSU, which was suspended a couple of years ago because of its distribution of information on an Israel Defence Forces program, has long been restored.

The eight-member Experience slate is headed by presidential candidate Kahleed Juma, president of the Economics Students Association.

"Four years ago, Concordia was labelled by the international media as an institution divided by conflict," Juma writes on the group's website. "Since then, Concordia has grown into a university that thrives on the diversity of its student body, embracing dialogue and understanding. Next year, Experience will take these ideas and create a new era of student governance by building a strong sense of pride in the hearts of Concordians… We want this university to be a place that you are proud to be part of and are saddened to leave.

"We are dedicated to placing your needs and aspirations above and beyond the fleeting realm of student politics."

A similar concern to Portnoy's is held by current CSU vice-president for communication, Steven Rosenshein, who is in his fourth year. He is worried that another slate called Conscious, the only other serious contender, may return the CSU to a more politicized agenda, and consequently a more fractious campus atmosphere.

The radicals may be quiet, but he thinks they are waiting in the wings to get back in power. "After all we've accomplished in the past couple of years, it would be a real shame if the CSU fell into their hands again.

"There's a stark difference from the poisoned atmosphere of three years ago. It's a kinder, gentler Concordia today. It's also frustrating that after we've made all these positive initiatives, the media is not so interested, and the public continues to think things are the same as they were."

He concedes the current state is due, at least in part, to the calmer relations between Israel and the Palestinians compared to when the intifadah was raging. Some of the leading radical students have also moved on.

Conscious is running a nine-member slate headed by Svetla Turnin. The group calls itself "Professional Students at Work" and highlights the fact that its members come from different cultures and university departments, and include local, out-of-town and international students.

"We love Concordia and we want to see a union that is not only responsive to students but is also pro-active in defending their interests to the university and beyond," its website states. The candidates have been executives on clubs such as Amnesty International Concordia, the Muslim Students Association and Students for a Free Tibet.

It's presenting a lengthy platform that includes advocacy for freezing tuition, promoting anti-poverty initiatives and making post-secondary education a "fundamental right."

Rosenshein said that, although its published platform may appear innocuous, he feels the group's actual intentions may be different.

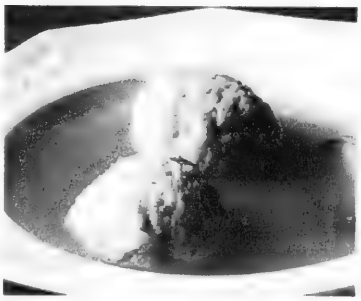
Friends Welcome



Passover Food Ideas

Passover food from around the world

Passover is the Jewish celebration that calls for the most preparation. Even as we clean our house from top to bottom and ensure that we have enough dishes and utensils to last the eight days, we think about seder menus, compare chol hamoed meals and draw up guest lists.

For some, the seder meal is an opportunity to have new friends join them or to invite those who may otherwise be alone on the holiday.

It may also be a time to try new recipes or add a different twist to an old favourite.

For many, however, Passover is a time of tradition. Their cousins, aunts and uncles gather year after year to partake in the same meal their family has prepared for generations.

This Passover season, we have spoken to a number of people who have made Canada their new home, yet steadfastly hold on to their own Passover traditions. They have shared with us some of their timeless recipes.

What does not change, however, is the retelling of the Passover story. No matter what language and no matter whether the Haggadah comes from a local grocery store or was handed down from a great-grandmother in a foreign land, we all tell the story of the Jewish people's liberation from Egypt. It is this story that unites us.

This year, we include a number of recipes that we hope will be a welcome addition to your seder table.

The ingredients in all our recipes are acceptable for Passover use, according to either Ashkenazi or Sephardi custom, and can be purchased kosher for Passover in most large Jewish communities.

From all of us at The CJN, enjoy your Passover meals, and we wish you a chag kasher v'samayach.

Passover cooking, Turkish style

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Jane Elvin moved here from Turkey 29 years ago, she brought with her a prized possession, the Passover pan she uses to make burmeolos, a type of matzah ball.

"These burmeolos, made in the pan that has hollow grooves, are the first Pesachdik food we eat each year. We open the seder with them."

Born and raised in Istanbul, Elvin says her Turkish heritage is always with her. "My family spoke Ladino and I always have a Ladino Haggadah at the seder table. I want the spirit of my parents with me throughout the meal."

Growing up, she says, she always looked forward to Passover. "We would have about 25 or 30 guests for the seder, and throughout the week, we would visit each other and bring flowers. We tried to make the whole week festive. We never wanted it to end."

The seders were always at her house, Elvin says, because her father was the eldest brother. "My mother would begin koshering the kitchen two or three days before, and she would set the table with a special embroidered table cloth."

Their Passover food never varied. "For every holiday, we ate specific foods. We always knew what to expect, and we always looked forward to it. I know that if I would go to Turkey today, they would have the same food on the table."

Their charoset, she says, is always made of black currants, which she has soaked, dried and crushed with a mortar and pestel. "It looks like mud, but it's delicious."

A favourite dish is her meatballs, some made with potatoes and some made with spinach, and "we always end the seder with a compote made of prunes, apricots and golden raisins, and a piece of marzipan.

"We cooked everything with lots and lots of vegetables – zucchinis, eggplants, spinach, leeks or tomatoes. All these foods bring me back to my childhood.

"We had a vibrant community, which I came to appreciate more when I moved here."

ELVIN'S MOTHER'S BURMEOLOS

6 eggs
1½ cups sugar
1 cup matzah meal
1 cup walnuts
¼ cup orange juice
zest of orange

Mix all ingredients, and bake in pyrex dish at 350 for 30 minutes.

BIMUELOS DE MATSA PATATA I KEZO
Balls made of matzah, potatoes and cheese

4 pieces of matzah
water to cover matzah
2 potatoes, boiled and mashed
1 cup of grated cheese
4 eggs
salt

Leave the pieces of matzah in water until they get soft. Squeeze out the water. Add the boiled mashed potatoes, cheese, beaten eggs and salt and mix them all together. Form into balls and fry on both sides.

MINA DE KARNE MULINADA

5 eggs
250 gr (a little over ½ lb.) of minced meat
1 large onion, finely chopped
1 bunch of parsley
1 large tomato, finely cut
1 boiled potato, mashed
6 pieces of matzah

Put some salt and water in a cup, wet the pieces of matzah in it and then strain them. Meanwhile, fry the finely chopped onion until it gets dark, then add the meat and keep on frying together till meat is cooked. Finally, add the finely cut tomato, parsley, salt and pepper and cook them for about 5 minutes.

In a bowl, beat 2 eggs and mix them with 3 slices of wet matzah squeezed well. Heat some oil in an oven-proof pan and place the egg-matzah mixture on the bottom. Put the meat mixture on top and then repeat with the other 3 slices of matzah, mixing them with two more eggs. Place this second egg-matzah mixture over the meat. Mix the final egg with the mashed potatoes and add a little water. Place this mixture on top of everything else and bake it in the oven at 350 until the potatoes are browned.

MASAPAN
Almond paste

1 kg ground almonds
750 gr of sugar
juice of one lemon

Add water to sugar until it is totally covered, and bring to a boil. Before the sugar becomes a jelly, add the lemon juice and the almonds and keep stirring. When it starts to boil, remove from heat and let it cool. Cut into a variety of shapes.

Kosher by Design author coming to Toronto

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

With the anticipation generally reserved for the appearance of a rock star, many in the Jewish community of Toronto are abuzz with excitement: Susie is coming!

"Susie" is Susie Fishbein, the effervescent author of the Kosher by Design cookbooks, who has turned kosher cooking on its proverbial ear. And no wonder she bubbles over. According to Gedaliah Zlotowitz, Mesorah Publications' vice-president of sales and marketing, over 160,000 copies have sold, with no end in sight.

Fishbein will make an exclusive appearance on March 29 at the Copper Creek Golf Club at a dinner whose theme is "The Essential Woman: Feeding the Body, Nourishing the Soul." Proceeds go to the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY), and 500 lucky guests will watch and kvell as their idol demonstrates the dishes on the menu.

I caught up with Fishbein recently at one of three Los Angeles appearances she made supporting local yeshivot.

Susie Fishbein

Risa Moskowitz, who chaired the event for Emek Hebrew Academy Teichman Family Torah Center, said, "When I booked her, everyone said, 'Oh my gosh, I live by her cookbooks!' There wasn't one person who said 'Who?' People who aren't kosher don't realize what's possible for us now, the variety of foods and the way to prepare them. They think kosher means dried out, salted meat. Her books have had a tremendous impact."

Beloria Fink, whose sister drove from San Diego to join her that evening, observed, "Susie can take a simple recipe and it looks extravagant and elegant, like you've really knocked yourself out. She's taken the bland, traditional Shabbat meal and turned it into elegant cuisine. She shows you how to set a beautiful table for each holiday so you can create a legacy for your own children."

The luscious table settings and presentation ideas that party planner Renee Erreich and Fishbein created for the Kosher by Design books – and photographer John Uher shot – fairly leap off the pages. But everything is doable.

"The food looks intimidating, but the recipes are not," Fishbein said. "These are recipes the family will want to eat over and over." And they do. So popular are these dishes that guests recognize them on each other's Shabbat tables!

Fishbein's popular Spinach Salad awaited guests as they entered the Emek dinner. "I can recognize it 100 per cent," said one guest, Amy Leibowitz. "I went to two houses recently for Shabbat, and there was Susie's Confetti Cake."

"Everybody makes the Spinach Salad and the Tri-Color Gefilte Fish," added Vardit Aharonoff, who gave a Kosher by Design baby shower recently. "I set up the table with candy in martini glasses. I never would have thought of that by myself."

Loren Puterman agreed. "You look good when you prepare her food. Who has time to spend hours in the kitchen on a Friday?"

Routinely dubbed the Jewish Martha Stewart, Fishbein squirms at the comparison. "I'm flattered, but it's not really accurate," she said. "Martha Stewart is all about a lifestyle. If you want beautiful flowers, you plant them and this is how you do it. We're busy. We have kids. We have jobs. We're in and out of the kitchen trying to make fabulous meals. I take shortcuts she would never take. I'm about cutting to the chase to accomplish our goals."

Linda Rubenstein, who hosted the event in her magnificent Valley Village home, was amazed that her 15-year-old son Jeremy had gone through Fishbein's latest book, Kosher by Design Kids in the Kitchen and flagged all the dishes he wanted to try.

"Here I was trying to get him interested in cooking," she said, "and he decided on his own to try the onion soup for breaking the fast."

Just what is this revolution in kosher cooking that Fishbein has spawned? As Rachel Ziv explained, "These are not like your grandmother's recipes. The ingredients are accessible and the recipes are presented in a light and modern way."

How does Fishbein herself explain the hoopla surrounding her books? Unpretentious despite her success, she observed, "I was at the right place at the right time. The kosher restaurants have been going up in quality, showing people what food can look and taste like. Good kosher ingredients were becoming more available, and the orthodox community was poised for something new.

"I think I hit a nerve in the community. People clearly have had a creative passion in them that was waiting to be unleashed. I've unleashed their inner cook."

The Toronto event is chaired by Aviva Eisenberger and Harriet Feintuch, and all proceeds are earmarked for NCSY's Torah High program.

For information, call NCSY at 905-761-6279.

Share some out-of-the-ordinary dishes with guests

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

Enjoying a career in the food industry means a lot of different things. It definitely means you have a challenging and exciting career. However, it also means no one wants to invite you over for dinner, ever. And it means family and friends, people in the grocery store and in the gym (or wherever you happen to hang out), expect you to prepare menus for the holidays that are creative and different from the recipes that have been passed down from generation to generation.

I, for one, happen to love those time-honoured family favourites. I have to admit though that I do relish every year throwing in a few novel dishes, just for the sake of interest. And, of course, for the sake of my reputation!

This year, in addition to the not-to-be-replaced brisket, I'm going to make a tantalizing, spice-rubbed turkey breast as well as glazed cipolline onions, a personal favourite. An asparagus soup laced with saffron makes a lively, seasonal change from chicken soup, and a crunchy nut torte defines a chocolate tradition for this year's Passover.

ASPARAGUS SOUP WITH SAFFRON

¼ tsp. saffron threads, crumbled
5 cups chicken broth
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
3½ lb. asparagus spears, trimmed and cut into two-in. lengths
1 large baking potato, peeled and cut into cubes
1 tsp. each salt and pepper

In a small saucepan, combine saffron with ½ cup of chicken broth; bring to a boil. Cover and simmer to keep warm. Separate 1½ cups of tips from rest of asparagus; set aside.

In a large saucepan, heat oil over medium heat. Add asparagus, salt and pepper and cook, stirring, for 3 minutes or until bright green. Stir in potato and saffron liquid. Stir to coat vegetables well, about 1 minute. Pour in 4 cups of remaining chicken broth. Bring to boil; reduce heat and simmer for about 20 minutes or until vegetables are very tender.

Meanwhile, bring saucepan of salted water to boil. Add reserved asparagus tips. Cook for two minutes. Drain immediately and refresh under cold running water. Dry on paper towels; set aside.

In batches, puree soup in blender or food processor. Return soup to saucepan. Stir in remaining broth to thin if necessary. Soup can be cooled, covered and refrigerated for up to 24 hours. Reheat soup gently. Spoon into warmed bowls. Garnish with reserved blanched asparagus tips. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

SPICE RUBBED TURKEY BREAST WITH MUSTARD CHIVE SAUCE

1 tbsp. coriander seeds
1 tbsp. yellow mustard seeds
2 tsp. fennel seeds
2 tbsp. sweet Spanish paprika, preferably smoked
2 tsp. kosher salt
1½ tsp.pepper
1 boneless rolled turkey breast (about 3½ lbs.)
1 tbsp.vegetable oil

Sauce
¼ cup sherry vinegar
2 tbsp. Dijon mustard
2 tbsp. orange juice
1 tsp. granulated sugar
½ cup olive oil
¼ cup chopped fresh chives
¼ cup chopped fresh basil

Spice up your seder meal

Using mortar and pestle or in spice grinder, combine coriander, mustard and fennel seeds and grind finely. Stir in paprika, pepper and salt. Transfer mixture to shallow bowl. Coat turkey on all sides with spice rub. Let stand at room temperature for 30 minutes or cover and chill for up to 24 hours.

In very large skillet, heat oil over medium-high heat; brown turkey all over, about 3 to 4 minutes per side.

Place turkey on lightly greased rack in roasting pan; roast in 325-degree oven for about 1½ to 2 hours or until juices run clear and meat thermometer registers 170 degrees. Transfer to carving board, reserving any juices in bottom of roasting pan and tent with foil; let stand for 20 minutes. Slice turkey thinly; arrange on serving platter. Serve with chive sauce.

While turkey is roasting make sauce. In small bowl, whisk together vinegar, mustard, orange juice and sugar until blended. Gradually whisk in oil until thickened. Stir in chives and basil. Stir in any reserved pan juices.

Sauce can be covered and refrigerated for up to 24 hours. Bring completely to room temperature and whisk to reblend before serving. Sauce can also be gently warmed in a microwave on 50 per cent power for 1½ minutes. Makes 8 servings.

GLAZED CIPOLLINE ONIONS

2 tbsp. olive oil
1½ lb. small cipolline onions (or shallots), halved and peeled
¼ tsp. salt
1 cup chicken broth
3 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
2 tbsp. Dijon mustard
2 tbsp. honey
1 tbsp. lemon juice

In a large skillet, heat oil over medium-high heat. Add onions and salt; cook, stirring often, until onions are nicely browned on all sides, about 5 minutes. Pour in chicken broth. Bring to boil; reduce heat and simmer, partially covered, for 5 minutes or until liquid is almost completely absorbed and onions are tender crisp.

Meanwhile whisk together balsamic vinegar, lemon juice, mustard and honey; pour into skillet, stirring to coat onions. Cook, stirring often, for 5 to 10 minutes or until onions are fully coated and sauce has reduced to a glazelike consistency. Serve immediately or keep warm for up to 15 minutes. Makes 8 servings.

DOUBLE NUT CHOCOLATE TORTE

8 oz. bittersweet chocolate, coarsely chopped
½ cup margarine or butter
2 tbsp. extra-strength coffee or espresso
¾ cup granulated sugar
½ cup potato starch
¼ cup finely chopped blanched almonds or macadamia nuts
¼ cup finely chopped pecans
4 eggs, separated

Chocolate glaze:
6 oz. bittersweet chocolate, coarsely chopped
4 oz. non-dairy liquid cream substitute sliced almonds, toasted

In top of double boiler set over hot, not boiling water, melt chocolate, butter and coffee until melted and smooth. Whisk in half of sugar while still hot, stirring until sugar is dissolved. Stir in egg yolks, one at a time, stirring well after each addition.

Stir in almonds, pecans and potato starch.

In a large bowl, with electric beater, beat egg whites until soft peaks form. Gradually add remaining sugar, beating until stiff, glossy peaks form. Fold one-third into chocolate mixture to lighten.

In two additions, fold in remaining egg whites. Scrape mixture into lightly greased 9-in. springform pan. Bake in centre of preheated 375-degree oven for about 20 minutes or until sides feel firm but centre is still slightly soft. Cool in pan on rack. Invert pan onto serving plate.

Glaze: In saucepan, bring non-dairy whipped topping to boil; pour over chocolate, whisking until melted and smooth. Let cool slightly. Pour over chocolate cake, letting excess rip down sides. Garnish edge of cake with sliced almonds. Makes 10-12 servings.

Family carries on some Egyptian traditions

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Mimi Paoli, born and raised in Mansoura, Egypt, adopted one Ashkenazi tradition when she came to Canada in the early 1960s. She serves chicken soup with kneidlach at her seder.

"Other than that, I serve the same food as my mother served when I was growing up. I've carried on all her traditions."

Passover preparations in Egypt began weeks before the actual holiday, says Paoli, with the making of the wine.

"We would soak the raisins and grind them, and then my brother would squeeze them. That's the wine we drank all year. It was our seder wine, and then we used it for Shabbat and holidays."

Egyptians eat rice during Passover, says Paoli, and it formed a big part of their seder menu. "We do a lot of stuffing, such as stuffed zucchini, or eggplant or artichokes stuffed with meat. My sisters still make veal pockets stuffed with rice. If we don't serve stuffed something at the seder, someone always asks why."

Although she never cooked at home – she didn't know how to cook when she got married – she watched her mother preparing all of these dishes, she says, and now prepares them for her own seders.

"She would also make a beef stew with turmeric and spices, or meatballs with cumin. Her fish was cooked in tomato sauce with garlic, cumin and parsley. She knew nothing about gefilte fish, brisket or kugels.

"My mother also made a lot of labour-intensive items. She would pickle lemons and beets, and would make all kinds of jams such as coconut, strawberry or apricot. The jams are served on a teaspoon when people come to visit – they're not for breakfast. It was a lot of work, but she made enough to last a long time."

Although their seder service is similar to an Ashkenazi service, she says there is one Egyptian tradition that she still carries on. "Each person in turn puts the matzah cover over their shoulder and we ask them, 'Where are you from?'

"They reply, 'From Egypt.'

"We ask, 'Where are you going?' and they say, 'Jerusalem.'"

Paoli offers this recipe.

STUFFED ZUCCHINI

6 zucchinis cut into halves
½ lb. ground beef
1 cup rice
salt, pepper to taste

Scoop out interior of zucchini. Sprinkle salt and pepper in zucchini shells. Mix meat and rice together and stuff zucchini loosely. Place on flat oven-proof pan and sit zucchinis in a little water, to which salt and pepper have been added. Cook about one hour at 350.

Keep Passover cooking stress-free

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Preparing for Passover can be overwhelming for some – cleaning, shopping, menu planning, guests to invite, where to sleep guests – a seemingly endless list of things to do.

Choose simple recipes that don't require too many ingredients or steps. Ask your guests to bring a homemade cake or cookies, or buy some.

Let your children help. When my daughters were young, they used to make seder kits. They would wash and dry the lettuce, measure it and place the specified amounts in a plastic zip-lock bag. This saved time for me, and the girls enjoyed doing it.

Consider using disposables, especially if you are having a large group for meals. Today there are disposables that are as beautiful as real china.

Here are some recipes for a relatively light and easy-to-do seder menu:

CONFETTI VEGETABLE KUGEL

Norene Gilletz's recipe is so colourful and so delicious, you'll want to make it year-round. It can be made quickly in a food processor and it freezes and/or reheats well.

3 medium zucchini, unpeeled
3 carrots, peeled
2 sweet potatoes or 3 large potatoes (about 1 lb.)
2 medium onions
2 cloves garlic
½ cup parsley leaves
3-4 tbsp. chopped fresh basil (or 1 tsp. dried)
¼ cup potato starch
1½ tsp. salt, or to taste
½ tsp. pepper, or to taste
2 tsp. olive oil

Preheat oven to 375. Grate zucchini, carrots and sweet potatoes. Finely mince onions, garlic, parsley and basil. Combine all ingredients in a large mixing bowl and mix well. Grease a 3-quart rectangular or oval casserole. Add vegetable mixture and spread evenly. Bake at 375 for 1 hour and 10 minutes, or until golden brown and firm.

Notes: Mixture can be baked in greased muffin pans at 375 for 25-30 minutes, until golden brown. Recipe can also be halved. Bake in a 1½-quart casserole for 45-55 minutes. Makes 12 servings.

BERRIES IN SWEET WINE

A simple and delicious end to a heavy meal. I have also used this as a first course.

2 pints fresh strawberries (cut in half if large)
2 pints fresh raspberries
2 pints fresh blueberries sugar
sweet or semi-sweet white wine
fresh mint leaves for garnish

Wash berries and remove stems. Sprinkle the berries with sugar and refrigerate until ready to serve. Just before serving, spoon berries into a large glass bowl or individual goblets. Pour ½ cup of wine over each serving and garnish with mint leaves. Makes 6 servings.

MOROCCAN PASSOVER BEET SALAD

A delicious and different side dish.

1 lb. beets
⅓ cup vinegar or lemon juice
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
3 tbsp. minced parsley
2 cloves garlic, minced
salt and pepper to taste

Leaving the beets whole and unpeeled, with one inch of stem and the root attached, scrub them thoroughly and boil them gently in water to cover until just tender (30-60 minutes, depending on size). Drain, peel and cut the beets into strips. Blend the oil and vinegar or lemon juice, add the beets, parsley and garlic and stir gently. Season with salt and pepper to taste and refrigerate until ready to serve. Serves 3-4.

STUFFED PEACHES

½ cup almonds
6-8 macaroons (enough to make ½ cup crumbs)
6 large, firm peaches or 12 canned peach halves
2 tbsp. sugar
1 tbsp. chopped candied orange peel, optional
½ cup sweet wine

Set out 10 x 6 x 1½-in baking dish.

Finely chop and set aside almonds. Grind by hand or in food processor enough macaroons to make ½ cup crumbs. Set crumbs aside.

If using fresh peaches, wash, pare and cut peaches into halves. Remove pit and a small portion of the pulp around cavity.

Combine and mix macaroon crumbs, chopped almonds, sugar and candied orange peel. Lightly fill peach halves with mixture. Put two halves together and fasten with wooden picks.

Place in baking dish and pour wine over peaches. Bake at 350 for 15 minutes and serve hot or cold. Makes 6 servings.

COR 488

Colourful fruits and vegetables

To help celebrate Passover, the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR) has tested some recipes for you and your family to enjoy.

AVOCADO FRUIT BOWL

3 medium size avocados
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
2 apples, peeled and diced
2 pears, peeled and diced
2 bananas, peeled and diced
2 oranges, peeled, sectioned and cut
1/4 cup Passover liqueur
fresh flat leaf parsley sprigs

Cut each avocado in half. Remove pits. Brush with lemon juice. Combine all the fruit with remaining lemon juice and the liqueur. Fill each avocado half with the fruit mixture. Garnish with a sprig of parsley.

Note: Canned fruit salad may be used. Drain well. Serves 6 as appetizer or dessert.

ROASTED GINGER TURKEY

12 lb. turkey rinsed and dried inside and out
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 tbsp. ginger
1 tbsp. paprika
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. pepper
1 tbsp. grated lemon rind
1 tbsp. olive oil

Place turkey in a large roasting pan. In a small bowl, mix ingredients together into a paste. Rub inside and out of the turkey. Preheat oven to 350.

Stuffing:
2 tbsp. oil
1 medium onion, chopped
2 ribs celery, chopped
1/2 green or red pepper, chopped
1/2 lb. mushrooms, chopped
1/2 cup Passover noodles
3 cups matzah farfel
dash of pepper
2 cans undiluted condensed chicken soup
1 egg

In a skillet, heat oil and lightly brown the onion, celery, pepper and mushrooms. Remove from heat and add remaining ingredients. Mix well. Spoon stuffing loosely into turkey cavity. Wrap stuffed turkey in foil. Place turkey, breast side down, and roast for 2 hours. Remove foil from turkey and turn to brown evenly. Roast another 2 hours, basting frequently with pan juices.

Sauce:
2 tbsp. honey
2 tbsp. lemon juice
1/4 cup Passover liqueur

Baste turkey again with sauce and roast an additional 1/2 hour or until leg joint moves easily and juice is no longer pink.

Suggestion: Spoon extra stuffing into lightly oiled muffin tins and bake until brown and crispy.

Variation: Add a can of tomato-mushroom sauce to the stuffing.

Note: The carcass makes a delicious soup by adding any vegetables. Serves 8-10.

TANGY TURNIPS IN ORANGE CUPS

An ideal trim for the roasted turkey.

2 lb. turnips, peeled and cut in strips
2 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. margarine
2 tsp. chopped flat leaf parsley
2 tsp. finely chopped onions
2 tsp. fresh lemon juice

In a small amount of boiling water, cook turnips in a covered saucepan until tender (about 20 minutes). Drain. Add remaining ingredients. Toss. Serve or spoon into orange cups. Garnish with parsley.

Orange cups:
4 large oranges, washed.

Cut oranges in half and make diagonal slits in each orange half with a sharp knife all the way around. Scoop out pulp, leaving a shell about 1/2 inch thick. (Use the pulp in a fruit salad or other dish). Cut a small piece off each bottom half so that orange will stand straight. Serves 8.

ISRAELI VEGETABLE SALAD

In Israel, this is served from breakfast to dinner.

8 tomatoes, cut in small cubes
2 English cucumbers, cut in small cubes
4 green onions, thinly sliced
3 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste

Combine vegetables. Mix dressing ingredients together and add to vegetables to coat. Garnish generously with chopped flat leaf parsley. Serves 6.

CARROT AND SWEET POTATO RING

For those on a no salt diet.

2 tbsp. oil
1 large onion, chopped
1 lb. cooked carrots, mashed
1 lb. cooked sweet potatoes, mashed
1 tbsp. grated orange rind
2 tbsp. honey

Chopped liver as seen in The Passover Table by Susan R. Friedland, a HarperPerennial book.

Chopped liver without the extra fat

Reader Sheila Jacobson sent us this recipe for her chopped liver.

For years, she says, she struggled to find a no-fat or low-fat recipe for making chopped liver. "I didn't like broiling the liver because it seemed to dry it out before it was completely cooked through, and I didn't like frying it the way our mothers did because there was too much oil or fat involved in the frying process.

"So, some years ago, I began to simmer the liver in vegetable broth. It keeps the liver very moist, and it becomes very tender and tasty when finished cooking.

"I use beef liver because it has an intense liver taste, a high content of B vitamins and a firmer texture when chopped in a food processor."

For making crisp, fried onions, she says, it's best to use ordinary yellow onions and not onions with a high sugar content such as Vidalia because the high sugar content carmelizes and burns by the time the onions become crisp.

SHEILA JACOBSON'S BEEF CHOPPED LIVER

Use a 3-litre stainless steel saucepan; a stainless steel frying pan that is at least 3 inches deep and 9 inches in diameter or an electric, enclosed deep fryer; a food processor; a very sharp stainless steel Chef's knife, stainless steel fork, food tongs and medium spoon or ladle.

a few slices of raw beef liver, koshered enough vegetable broth to cover the beef liver in a shallow pan
salt
onion powder, to taste ordinary yellow onions to make crispy, fried onions (optional) – onions reduce to about a third after being fried

Pour enough vegetable broth in a stainless steel saucepan so that it is about ½-inch deep. Bring vegetable broth to a simmering boil on stove.

Place the slices of beef liver in the simmering vegetable broth and let simmer, covered, until the liver is cooked, turning slices over to ensure it is cooked on both sides. If vegetable broth seems to be running low in saucepan, add a little more broth so that it covers the liver at all times. Do not add salt at this stage as it will make liver tough.

Remove saucepan from hot stove, leaving the slices of cooked beef liver in the hot vegetable broth to keep the liver moist. If making several slices of beef liver that require the repeated use of the saucepan, remove the cooked slices of beef liver to a platter and use a ladle to pour some hot vegetable broth over the cooked slices to keep them moist while simmering new batches of liver in the saucepan.

To make the crisp, fried onions, slice onions very, very thin, so thin that the onion slices should be translucent when sliced and raw. The slices should also be very long, but not circular. For this you need to cut the onion in half, from root to stem, place the cut onion-half cut-surface down, and then slice it across the natural lines seen along the rounded surface, starting at either end (root or stem).

Use an oil that can withstand high temperatures (oil that has a high smoke point), but not olive oil, as it has a low smoke point and burns easily at high heat, which gives a bitter taste to the onions. If you have an electric, enclosed deep fryer, deep-fry the sliced onions until crisp. If you don't have a deep fryer, use the frying pan and add oil to a depth of about 1½ inches. Fry onions until very crisp and brown, using stainless steel food tongs to turn. Drain on paper or cloth to remove excess oil. Let cool to room temperature.

When the slices of cooked beef liver are cooled to room temperature, cut them into small pieces and set aside. Put a few pieces of the cooked beef liver into food processor with some of the vegetable broth from the saucepan in which the liver was cooked and some of the fried onions. Process until smooth.

If there is not enough vegetable broth left in the saucepan to add to the liver in the food processor, heat some more vegetable broth to a simmer, and use it to moisten liver as it blends into a paste. Repeat with remaining pieces of cooked beef liver, but leave some of the crisp, fried onions to place on finished chopped liver as garnish.

After processing all the liver, add salt and onion powder to taste. Mix them throughout the chopped liver so that there are no pockets of salt or onion powder. Place remaining crisp, fried onions on top of the chopped liver in serving dish, as garnish.

For a no-fat chopped liver, don't use any sautéed onions. Just blend the cooked beef liver into a pâté in a food processor, using only salt and onion powder for seasoning, and some of the vegetable broth to keep the liver moist and flavourful.

1/4 cup Passover liqueur (optional)

Preheat oven to 375. Heat oil, sauté onion for 5 minutes. Add to mashed carrots and sweet potatoes. Add remaining ingredients and beat until fluffy. Pile into well-greased ring mould and bake for 25-30 minutes. Serve hot.

STRAWBERRY MERINGUE TARTS

3 egg whites (have at room temperature for at least 1 hour) pinch salt
1 cup sugar

Beat egg whites with salt and lemon juice until they become foamy. Gradually add sugar (2 tbsp. at a time), beating at high speed until very stiff peaks form and sugar is dissolved. This takes about 10 minutes.

Preheat oven to 250. Line a cookie sheet with freezer paper, shiny side up. Draw 8 circles, 3 1/2 in. in diameter. Fill each circle with 1/4 cup of the meringue. Gently form into a shallow cup shape with the back of a spoon. Bake 1 hour, turn off oven and let dry in oven (door closed) for 1 hour. Remove from paper.

These can be made up to 3 weeks in advance and stored in a metal container in a cool dry place.

Fill meringue shells with fresh strawberries and top with glaze.

Filling:
1 pint fresh strawberries

Wash, drain and hull berries. Dry well. Place 1 whole berry in centre of meringue shell. Cut remaining berries in halves. Place around whole berry in shell. Sprinkle lightly with black pepper. Pour glaze over.

Glaze:
1 pint fresh berries
1 cup water
1 cup sugar
2 tbsp. potato starch

Crush 1 pint berries and combine with water, sugar and potato starch in saucepan. Bring to boil and cook 2 minutes or until thickened. Cool. Pour over berry-filled tarts.

Israel starts mass sorting poultry to fight bird flu

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — For once, terrorists are not the infiltrators that are most worrying Israelis.

The Jewish state joined the fraternity of nations affected by avian flu last weekend, when a contagion in the Negev prompted the mass sorting of poultry and quarantine of several farm personnel.

With less than two weeks before national elections, interim Prime Minister Ehud Olmert moved fast to prevent panic.

"The fact that avian flu has been discovered warrants serious attention, but I recommend we stay calm to ensure this does not spread to humans," he told his cabinet on Sunday.

Formally known as H5N1, avian flu has reached across Europe, Africa and parts of Asia since 2003, killing at least 100 people who caught it from infected fowl, and killing or forcing the slaughter of tens of millions of chickens and ducks across Asia. Scientists fear it may mutate into a strain that can pass between humans, triggering a global pandemic.

Although health officials did not immediately confirm that ailing turkeys discovered at four Negev farms had been the victims of H5N1, the government took no chances, ordering all poultry at the affected sites poisoned and buried.

Some $3.4 million (US) was earmarked to compensate farmers for their losses. Some 400,000 to 500,000 turkeys and chickens would be killed. Israeli farmers annually raise 200 million birds for food.

Four agricultural workers who showed signs of the flu were hospitalized. But tests revealed they did not have H5N1.

Agriculture Minister Ze'ev Boim said closures had been imposed on the four Negev farms to prevent the flu from moving northward. He predicted that the outbreak would be eradicated within 45 days.

Officials have also played down media reports that some infected poultry may have already reached stores, noting that the meat could be consumed as usual if properly cooked.

"There is no lack of meat, and the public need not fear meat bought in recognized stores," Boim said.

Despite the ministry's assurances, poultry and egg sales dropped in Israel last weekend, Ha'aretz reported. The Israeli daily quoted predictions from economists that more than 40 per cent of the businesses in the poultry, egg and meat sectors are in danger of going out of business as a result of the expected drop in sales.

In neighbouring Egypt, a 30-year-old woman died of avian flu, stoking regional jitters. Israel has been co-operating closely with Jordan and the Palestinian Authority, testing dead fowl found in the West Bank and Gaza on behalf of their owners.

Despite the testing, Palestinian heath officials buried alive hundreds of chickens on Saturday, saying they didn't want to risk waiting for the results.

With Hamas on the verge of forming a government in the Palestinian Authority, a cutoff of diplomatic ties seems inevitable. But one Israeli official voiced optimism that this would not affect efforts to keep avian flu at bay.

"I hope that the very close co-operation which we have with our neighbours will continue. Everybody has to eat," an Agriculture Ministry spokesperson said.

Apathy born from mistrust of the government

Beyond this is apathy born from a rising mistrust of the government to effect change, disgust with recent revelations of corruption and an increasingly individualistic society that feels less of a need to be involved civically.

Voter apathy is even more apparent in Israel's younger generation. A poll by One Voice, a grassroots movement that encourages dialogue between Israelis and Palestinians, found that 27 per cent of people between the ages of 18 and 32 are interested in the upcoming elections and that 44 per cent plan to vote.

Analyst Yossi Klein Halevi welcomes the establishment of Kadima, he said, and the low-key, yet "historic" election he said it seems to have prompted.

"People who complain that this is a boring election are frustrated leftists and rightists. This is our first election in which the centre is not only a vague longing on the part of many Israelis but an actual option," said Halevi, a senior fellow at Shalem Center, a think-tank in Jerusalem.

"This election has changed the political map for the first time in decades. We are no longer a society defined by a right and left schism but a political system with a strong centre."

Halevi sees the changes in Israeli politics as a sign of political maturation.

"One reason we have so many political parties is that we have still been in the mentality of the Jewish exile in which you needed to find the party that represented your highest ideals precisely," he said.

"We are seeing parties as frameworks for resolving issues through compromise," Halevi said. "This is a realization of normal politics."

Candidates and campaigners, however, continue to employ the language of left and right. Benjamin Netanyahu of Likud has taken to calling Olmert, "Smolmert," a pun on the Hebrew word for left. In one of the Likud's ad campaigns, which have been seen as the most negative among the parties, an announcer's voice intones, "Olmert and the left will bring Hamas closer."

Ad campaigns are used by parties of all sizes: every night, campaign ads are broadcast for a consecutive hour on three national television networks.

Some of the smaller groups broadcasting include a party against high banking fees, a party representing Holocaust survivors and their children, and the Green Leaf Party, which promotes legalizing marijuana and gay marriage.

In one Labor ad, party leader Amir Peretz, who is battling an image as an anti-intellectual demagogue, is seen in a mock prime ministerial office signing papers on a large desk, Israeli flags standing behind him.

Meanwhile, at the port of Tel Aviv, Yitzhak Schwartzblat watches Peres kiss a baby. This is not the first time Schwartzblat, 71, has seen Peres on the campaign trail. He remembers hearing him speak during 1955 elections at a movie hall in Jaffa.

In those days, campaigning was very different, he said.

"People then knew exactly what the message of each party was. Today it does not matter – look at Peres," he said referring to his switch from Labor to Kadima. "Yesterday he was in one party, today another."

Schwartzblat would not reveal who he was voting for.

"I don't have a lot of secrets but this one secret I keep," he said.

As interest in day schools grows, funders emerge to aid education

By CHANAN TIGAY
JTA

NEW YORK — News that a matching grant program has pulled in $26 million (US) for Jewish day schools is giving those involved with Jewish education in North America reason for optimism.

Organizers announced last week that the Match program would be funneling donor money to Jewish day schools and education projects, and would be supplementing those funds with matching grants of 50 cents on the dollar, bringing the total raised through the initiative to $26 million.

Six Canadian schools are among those expected to benefit from the program – Associated Hebrew Schools, Bais Chaya Mushka, Cheder Chabad and United Synagogue Day School, all in the Toronto area; Kehila Jewish Community Day School in Hamilton, Ont.; and, in Montreal, Herzliah High School's Snowdon campus, said Mark Charendoff, president of the Jewish Funders Network, which sponsored the program along with the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education and funding from The Avi Chai Foundation and a host of other philanthropists.

"I think there is certainly a renewed interest in day schools as a mechanism for meeting the challenges of ensuring a positive Jewish identity in the next generation," Charendoff said.

"I think the question was always, is that interest deep or wide?"

"We saw in the past that it was definitely deep," he continued. "What this initiative points to for the first time is that it's wide as well."

That, sponsors say, is highlighted by the fact that Match not only exceeded its sponsors' fundraising goals, but attracted some 300 donors who had not previously allocated funds to day schools.

Word of Match's success follows on the heels of several large gifts to Jewish education.

It also came on the eve of PEJE's March 19-21 Assembly for Jewish Day School Education – which brought more than 900 supporters, professionals and leaders from hundreds of day schools to Boston to explore the opportunities and challenges facing day schools today, including how to raise funds as enrolments grow –and ahead of the funders network international conference in Denver.

"The day-school movement is growing stronger each year, thanks to new donors who are stepping up to give unprecedented support, and lay and professional leaders who are increasing their skills in fundraising, marketing and educational excellence," said PEJE's executive director, Rabbi Joshua Elkin.

Last month, news broke that the Jim Joseph Foundation, recently incorporated as a private foundation following its namesake's untimely death, would give some $25 million annually to Jewish education.

In January, the Charles E. Smith Jewish Day School in suburban Washington, D.C., received a $15 million gift. In late 2004, a group of anonymous families made a $45 million donation to three Boston-area day schools.

In 2001, the Sidney Kimmel Foundation announced a $20 million gift to the Raymond and Ruth Perelman Jewish Day School, a Solomon Schechter school in Wynnewood, Pa., that is affiliated with the Conservative movement.

"There has been building enthusiasm for the day-school enterprise that initially expressed itself through a dramatic increase in enrolment in the 1990s, which then led to greater funding needs," said Yossi Prager, Avi Chai's executive director. "The success of Match suggests that there are resources that can be tapped to meet those needs."

In addition to Avi Chai, the program is funded by Ingeborg and Ira Leon Rennert, the Charles and Lynn Schusterman Family Foundation, the Alan B. Slifka Foundation and Jewish Life Network/Steinhardt Foundation.

The money will go to 159 Jewish day schools in North America, along with eight day-school programs.

Most of the day schools solicited their own donors, and applications then were filed through the Match sponsors.

Nearly 300 applications were accepted for matching funds and schools in 25 states and two Canadian provinces, representing all Jewish denominations. Community schools not representing a particular stream will also get support.

Matching funds for individual gifts were capped at $50,000, and schools receiving multiple gifts were not given match funds over a total of $100,000.

It's the third in a series of matching grant programs run through the funders network beginning in 2004.

One of the initiatives, also run with Avi Chai, raised $6.8 million for Jewish education generally, rather than day schools alone; the other, run with the French Sacta-Rashi Foundation, raised $2.2 million for Israel.

The combined annual operating budgets of North American day schools is somewhere in the vicinity of $2 billion, Prager said. Most of that has to be covered by tuition, in addition to about $65 million provided annually by Jewish federations. The balance has to be raised from private funds, he said.

Schools say the Match program has been a fundraising boon.

"There was tremendous enthusiasm in knowing that people were going to have their dollar leveraged by a foundation," said Simcha Herring, director of development at the SAR Academy, a modern Orthodox day school in Riverdale, N.Y.

Program funders originally allocated $5 million to match $10 million in new gifts. But when applications totaled more than $18 million, they increased their own contributions and recruited additional philanthropists to match the $15.5 million that was eligible for matching funds.

The largest gift in conjunction with the program was $1 million, followed by another gift of $300,000, the funders network said.

"The story is these brand new donors to the scene," Charendoff said. "It's not about spending 50 cents to get a dollar. The point was identifying people who could keep giving year after year into the future. So it's 50 cents hopefully to get $10."

35th WORLD ZIONIST CONGRESS ELECTION

The Area Election Committee of the Canadian Zionist Federation hereby sets out the rules for the upcoming election for the 35th World Zionist Congress.

The vote for the 19 delegates and 19 alternates to Canada for the 35th World Zionist Congress will take place between April 1 and April 24, 2006. The vote will be a postal vote.

All eligible voters will receive a ballot, a list of candidates for each participating organization, and instructions for completing and returning the ballot by mail on or about April 11. Only ballots postmarked no later than April 24 and complying with the instructions will be included. Each eligible voter will be entitled to one vote. The results will be tabulated by an outside organization, verified by scrutineers from all member organizations, and published. Any appeal will be directed to the Area Election Committee.

ARZA CANADA: CANADIAN ASSOCIATION OF REFORM ZIONISTS
FRIENDS OF CANADIAN YOUNG JUDAEA/ZIONIST ORGANIZATION OF CANADA
HATIKVAH CANADA
MERCAZ-CANADA, THE ZIONIST ORGANIZATION OF THE CONSERVATIVE MOVEMENT UNITED TORAH COALITION
ZIONISTPARTY.COM

Each of these organizations is responsible for verifying its own list of eligible voters. Any questions as to whether an individual is an eligible voter should be directed to the organization or organizations of which the individual believes he or she is a member.

Each organization has provided a list of up to 19 candidates and 19 alternates. The 19 seats allocated to Canada will be distributed to the listed organizations based on the number of votes received by each organization in accordance with the Rules for the Election of Delegates to the Zionist Congress prepared by the World Zionist Organization. Delegates will be elected based on the seats assigned to each organization, in the order in which their names appear on the list enclosed with each ballot.

Ze'evi suspects should be tried in civil court, AG says

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — The five inmates from the Jericho prison allegedly involved in the 2001 assassination of former tourism minister Rehavam Ze'evi can be tried in Israel, Attorney-General Menahem Mazuz told the cabinet Sunday.

Mazuz said he preferred that they be tried in a civil rather than a military court, since two other defendants involved in the murder were already tried in Israeli civilian courts.

Concerns that the men could not be tried here because they have already been tried in a PA court were not relevant, Mazuz said, because they were never truly tried by the PA. He did not indicate when they might be charged here.

Mazuz made it clear that Israel claimed from the time the agreement was made to move the men from former PA president Yasser Arafat's headquarters in Ramallah to the prison in Jericho in 2002 that Israel would retain legal authority over the case and that there would be no legal impediment in the future to trying the men here.

Shin Bet (Israel Security Agency) head Yuval Diskin told the cabinet that the raid on the prison could make it more difficult in the future for the Palestinians to agree to hold security-related prisoners in their jails, because of the fear that Israel would at some stage come and take them away.

He said that in addition to netting the five men connected with Ze'evi's assassination and Karine A paymaster Fuad Shubaki, Israel also took into detention 33 other inmates suspected of terrorism related crimes, including one man suspected of killing an Israeli in 2001, and one of those who participated in the lynching of two Israeli reservists in Ramallah in 2000.

Another 250 detainees in the jail were released.

She does not feel betrayed by the Israeli government

Situated amid a bloc of settlements known as Gush Katif and populated by 80 families, Ganei Tal was a community whose villas and lush fields offered dramatic views of the Mediterranean Sea. If not for the barbed wire and army towers to maintain security, Ganei Tal may not have looked out of place in, say, southern California.

Tending to 4½ hectares of land with the aid of 25 employees, the Balabans prospered and enjoyed the comforts of a 380-square-metre home with modern amenities. "We had a nice house and very successful business," she said, a touch of nostalgia in her voice.

Today, in a far cry from their former luxurious dwelling, they live in a much smaller caravan in Yad Binjamin, an established village 40 minutes by car south of Ashkelon. They reside there with 79 other families from Ganei Tal.

"We're like a family," said Balaban, a determined, self-possessed woman who seems better off than many of the Israelis forced out of Gaza.

Eight months before Israel's fateful withdrawal, Balaban asked herself what would become of her 750,000 plants. "I never imagined we would give up Gaza. I thought we would stay forever. But I finally realized that the disengagement would take place. I didn't go against this decision with force. I left peacefully."

Having adopted a realistic attitude, in sharp contrast to those settlers who held out till the bitter end and currently find themselves unemployed and idle in camps and rented apartments, Balaban approached the Ministry of Agriculture with a plausible plan.

She wondered whether she could buy a piece of land close to the Mediterranean Sea, a climactic zone where her plants could flourish.

"I waited two months and nothing happened," she recalled. "So I bought three hectares worth of greenhouses and informed the ministry I needed a spot for them."

With the government's assistance, Balaban purchased a plot for herself and her daughter in Ashkelon's grim industrial area. The Jewish National Fund assisted by levelling the sand dunes characteristic of this region.

Then, in a remarkable operation that started in late July and ended before the evacuation deadline in mid-August, 500 volunteers from kibbutzim around the country converged on Ganei Tal to help her pack her precious plants.

Although she considers herself fortunate in comparison to other settlers from Gaza, Balaban is not entirely satisfied.

"Usually, a farmer lives near his farm. Not me! I had to struggle to gain access to water, and now I don't have a proper drainage system. This is not OK."

Neither does she have a land telephone line, which she desperately needs to conduct business transactions.

The government has compensated her to the tune of NIS 200,000 (about $43,000 US) for her house in Ganei Tal, but still apparently owes her NIS 78,000 (about $17,000 US) for each of the greenhouses she left behind.

Balaban, however, is grateful for a low-interest NIS 400,000 (about $86,000 US) loan she received from Israel.

Prior to moving to Gaza, she and her husband cultivated vegetables for export in the Galilee. "It was very difficult," she said. "Prices were not good."

As Balaban tells it, the government encouraged them to settle in Gaza, which, she fervently believes, is part and parcel of the Land of Israel.

They committed themselves to Gaza in the belief that Israel would never relinquish it and that the climate there would be conducive for the cultivation of flowers.

Though she was basically disappointed by Israel's pullout from Gaza, she does not, strangely enough, feel betrayed. She explained her reasoning by saying that the withdrawal was undertaken by a government democratically elected by the people.

"History will tell whether Israel made a mistake in giving up Gaza," she observed. "But in the meantime, Hamas is growing stronger and Qassams are falling near my greenhouses."

Israel displays anti-terror tech

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israel was to showcase state-of-the-art anti-terrorism technology it hopes to sell at a conference last Sunday for North American homeland security officials.

Since 9/11, the United States alone has invested hundreds of millions of dollars in homeland security.

Nissim Ben-Sheetrit, the foreign minister's deputy director-general, said the conference would bring together some 130 top-ranking homeland security officials from 37 U.S. states and from Canada. The idea, he said, was to share the expertise Israel has gained in fighting terrorism, and also to spotlight the technology that Israeli firms have developed.

The four-day conference was to include seminars by defence ministry and Israeli security officials as well as talks by Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Internal Security Minister Gideon Ezra. There were also to be demonstrations of how Israel is prepared to deal with different terrorist-related scenarios.

One of the major areas of interest, Ben-Sheetrit said, has to do with preparation for bio-chemical attacks.

In addition to the economic dimension, Ben-Sheetrit said Israel also hopes that, through this type of conference, it will develop close ties with individuals in the state governments who are close to the governors. He said Israel is considering holding similar types of conference for other countries, and that this is just the "first shot" in these types of programs.

Terror victims' families sue Iran

By RACHEL SILVERMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — Matt Eisenfeld would have been 35 by now; his fiancee, Sara Duker, 32.

He might have been a rabbi, she an environmental researcher. There are lots of things Matt and Sara could have been – but a suicide bombing in Jerusalem cut short their lives 10 years ago.

That incident also left the young couple's parents, Leonard and Vicki Eisenfeld and Arline Duker, grasping for answers.

The families have joined a growing number of individuals seeking legal retribution against the perpetrators of terrorist acts. For the plaintiffs, this means going into the lion's den – confronting terrorist organizations head on.

The Eisenfeld and Duker families soon learned that the mastermind behind the murder of their children was a Hamas terrorist trained and recruited by Iran.

That evidence allowed Washington-based lawyer Steve Perles, who has represented roughly 350 victims of terrorism, to build a case against the Islamic Republic of Iran.

"In the world of terrorism, it's the policy of the overarching owner that's responsible," Perles said. "This really puts Iran right at the epicentre of Hamas terrorism."

Vicki Eisenfeld agreed.

"Iran was the diabolical parent of this," she said. "You can't kill someone and not expect to have repercussions."

The families hope their court case can help create financial disincentives for terrorism.

"Iran's economy is more fragile than you think," Leonard Eisenfeld said. "If you shut off opportunities to invest in Europe, it creates economic disruption."

To some degree, their efforts have yielded success: The families have received $27 million (US) in compensatory damages, funneled from appropriated taxpayer funds in the U.S. Treasury.

But the case has encountered other bureaucratic snags, especially from officials in the U.S. State Department. Perles described the government's reticence as surprising, considering the administration's strong anti-terrorism stance.

"It is very schizophrenic and I don't begin to understand it," he said. "They consider what we're doing inconsistent with their turf."

A State Department official said it's a question of policy, not turf wars.

"The State Department has taken the position that to make payments like this is unfair and inequitable in a general manner," the official said. "We have to look at policy in a much more general way, not vis-a-vis individual constituents or individual plaintiffs.

"There are a lot of victims out there," the official continued. "But we serve the U.S. government and the U.S. taxpayer. We cannot say, 'Oh, these people are more deserving than these people.'"

'Friendly fire' kills soldier

St.-Sgt. Ido Shapira, who was killed during a clash with Palestinian terrorists in Jenin last week, was actually killed by "friendly fire," the army said. Shapira was shot as Israeli forces flushed out five fugitives from their hideout in Jenin. The Palestinians, most of them Al-Aqsa Brigade members, surrendered after the gunfight. Outside Nablus, two Israelis were wounded in a Palestinian shooting.

Black Hebrew at Eurovision

A member of the Black Hebrew community will represent Israel at this year's Eurovision song contest. Eddie Butler's solo Ze Hazman, or "This is the Time," was selected in a televised competition as the Israeli submission for the summer songfest. Butler, 34, was born to black Americans who came to the Jewish state as part of the Black Hebrew community, which considers itself descended from the ancient Israelites, although the story is rejected by Bible scholars. Butler competed at Eurovision in 1999 as part of the Israeli quartet Eden.

Kids mag promotes terror

The first issue of Hamas' online magazine for kids to be published since the group won Palestinian legislative elections advocates suicide bombing and hatred of Jews, the Anti-Defamation League says. The March 1 issue of Al-Fateh, a biweekly, emphasizes the "martyrdom" of a suicide bomber who killed 16 people in August 2004. For details, visit www.adl.org/main_Terrorism/al_fatch_hamas.htm.

Israeli schools on world list

Hebrew University led three Israeli universities on a list of the 200 best universities in the world. Hebrew University was ranked 77th in the Times of London Higher Education Supplement, up from 93rd in 2004. Tel Aviv University finished 188th after not appearing on last year's list, while the Technion in Haifa was 194th, down from 158th last year. The schools were ranked in a variety of categories, including academic peer reviews, citations of academic papers written by faculty, staff-to-student ratios and a survey of global recruiters of graduates. Harvard University finished first on the list, which was dominated by U.S. universities.

Israeli MK gets jail time

A lawmaker from Israel's Likud Party received a jail sentence in a corruption scandal. Tel Aviv Magistrate's Court sentenced Naomi Blumenthal to eight months behind bars after finding her guilty of providing illicit perks to Likud supporters and then trying to cover up the infraction. She also received a 10-month suspended sentence and was fined $16,000 (US). The court said it would put off implementing the sentence until after Israel's March 28 election, in which Blumenthal is a Likud candidate. She vowed to appeal.

Labour leaders sign pact

Labour leaders in Boston and Haifa hailed an agreement promoting stronger ties between union members in the sister cities. The agreement, the first between an Israeli and a U.S. city, was signed by Rich Rogers, executive secretary-treasurer of the Greater Boston Labor Council, and Baruch Zalts, chairman of the Histadrut-Haifa Labour Council. It calls for information sharing and an exchange of delegates to advance the welfare of workers and promote the right to organize unions.

Kingdom unearthed

Relics from an ancient Jewish city were uncovered in northern Israel. The Antiquities Authority announced it found evidence of a city from the Kingdom of Israel, which was formed during the split between Israel and Judah in the ninth and 10th centuries BCE, near Nazareth. Remains were also exposed dating from the Jewish settlement from the Roman period identified with "Kana of the Galilee," which is known from the Christian bible. Among other antiquities discovered from the period are "hiding refuges," underground pits linked by short tunnels that were built and hewn prior to the Great Revolt by the Jews against the Romans in 66 CE.

Graduating designers showcased at Ryerson fashion show

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

As Canada forges its way further into the global fashion market, Toronto is slowly becoming one of the world's strongest sources for blossoming talent.

The country's largest platform for launching young Canadian designers, and the biggest Canadian fashion show, is the annual Ryerson University School of Fashion's Mass Exodus.

The show, now in its 56th year, is an annual showcase of the school's graduating designers. With an impressive roster of successful alumni designers, including Arthur Mendonça, David Dixon and Paul Hardy, Ryerson's reputation as a source of fashion talent has been growing.

Showcasing more than 60 designers' works, Mass Exodus, on April 5 and 6, will be a spectacle in every way. With a $40,000 budget, the co-ordinators of the show are sure to wow the fashion industry like never before.

Mass Exodus 2006 features upcoming designer Jeremy Laing as its speaker. The definite "it-boy du jour," Laing has been showing in New York for the past two years to rave reviews. An alumni of the Ryerson University School of Fashion, Laing has been praised in Women's Wear Daily, the New York Times, Another Magazine and on Style.com.

This year's show, Open Concept, plays on popular trends dominating runways, architecture plans and magazines worldwide. The theme celebrates an industrial chic esthetic. The elaborate set will feature scaffolding, exposed light bulbs and an industrial-sized fan, among other things, to create the feeling of an empty warehouse or airport hangar.

Dress by Kristiann Boos

While this year's show marks the 56-year-old tradition of debuting fashion excellence, Mass Exodus 2006 also features many firsts.

Thanks to "Live Description" technology, visually impaired audience members will be able to hear a vividly detailed description of the show, whether they are at the event or watching from home via a live webcast (www.ryecast.ryerson.ca/dmp streams/massexodus2006/index.asp). Live Description technology brings the essence and excitement of a live fashion show to a visually impaired audience in North America for the first time.

Mass Exodus 2006 also marks the debut of a partnership with Lancôme. As the official sponsor of the show, Lancôme will provide the makeup for the models at the show.

A Lancôme Mass Exodus look has been created for the 150 models participating in the show. Using Lancôme's Spring 2006 Enchantress collection, the Mass Exodus styling team has dreamed up a rather enchanting look for the show.

Playing on current runway trends, the look they created is a strong yet subtle one. Focusing on a very smoky but elegant eye, the look will be created with dark and metallic hues of silver, grey and black. The eye will be accented with a bronzed and glowing face and is completed with a nude lip. This fresh and modern approach is highlighted by hair that is worn away from the face. Heavy parts and sleek hairstyles reminiscent of Italian runways will dominate the runway of Mass Exodus 2006.

With so many collections to see, one must keep an eye out for a few design greats in the making.

Graduating designer Natasha Lenart is sure to thrill the crowd with every outfit she shows. Her collection, Trial and Error, revolves around the theme of great inventors and scientists. It includes such pieces as a tangled parachute gown, inspired by the Wright brothers' invention of the plane, as well as a pocket-watch-inspired piece that features a bodice opening up into the workings of a watch, including the windings and gages, with springs popping out to symbolize something going terribly wrong.

Other designers to watch include Kristiann Boos, whose collection features divine hand-painted and dyed fabrics mimicking butterfly wings, as well as Cara Stryer, whose vintage yet tailored collection references Hitchcock films.

For more information on the show, visit www.massexodus.ca.

Faux jewelry from the Victorian era to today

By BARBARA KINGSTONE
Special to The CJN

Carole Tanenbaum, the daughter of two art collectors, has written a book about her own passion – faux jewelry.

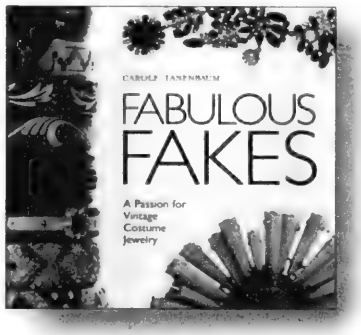
Tanenbaum's private collection of faux jewelry includes about 3,500 pieces, and she has placed some 8,000 items in various retail outlets.

As a youngster, American-born, now living in Canada, Tanenbaum began watching her art-collecting parents study their new found treasures, and this cultivated her own special eye for these baubles.

In the book Fabulous Fakes: A Passion for Vintage Costume Jewelry (Madison Press Books), she writes about the history of faux jewelry and she chronicles the lifestyle changes that are reflected in the jewelry we wear. The book features many stunning photographs.

In the opening chapter, Victorian Era & Art Nouveau (1837-1914), Tanenbaum discusses Queen Victoria's passion, not only for her husband Prince Albert, but also for fine adornment. Tanenbaum also devotes some space to the unusual hair jewelry created at that time. She quickly gets to the Industrial Revolution, which revolutionized many occupations, including jewelry making.

The beautifully shot photographs in this section document the Victorian fascination with nature. In one piece, coral glass beads drip from brass leaves. Jewelry representing the Egyptian Revival trend and delicate filigree sash pins, along with other pieces from this era, are a segue to the second chapter, Art Deco & Prewar (1920-1935), which opens with a photograph of a French-designed, modernist necklace. Clean, elegant and streamlined, and with abstract shapes and bold colouration, the necklace is truly the epitome of what this era was about.



The new style of women and their recently acquired freedom to vote, and the advent of the "machine age," as well as legendary fashion designers Madame Vionnet, Jean Patou, Jeannne Lanvin and Charles Worth, are covered in the section of the book devoted to the 1920s and early '30s.

That was also the era of Bauhaus, Dadasim and Cubism, and a time that fake jewelry gained popularity. Café society was in high step and women loved excess, wearing rows of bracelets, strands of beads and dangling earrings. And this jewelry was affordable!

The new plastic, Bakelite, and the discovery of King Tutankhamen's tomb, inspired jewelry designers. But it was Coco Chanel and Elsa Schiaparelli, both fashion-designing doyennes, who revolutionized costume jewelry by adorning their couture outfits with their tasteful fakes.

In sidebars throughout the book, Tanenbaum introduces well-known designers who mass produced jewelry.

The chapter Post-Depression & the War Years (1936-1949) details the renewal of interest in "dressing up" after the dark war years. It's here that we learn about such designers as Trifari, Miriam Haskell and Boucher, who mass produced fab fakes that are now important, and pricey, collectibles.

The delightful chapter titled The Fifties (1950-1959) is so opulent and colourful it made me want to rush off to one of Tanenbaum's retailers and snap up all their wares.

In the chapter The Sixties & Seventies (1960-1979), Coppola e Toppo, who created jewelry for fashion designers Valentino, Pucci and Balenciaga, and the chief jewelry designer of Vendome, Helen Marion, and her artful brooches are highlighted.

The chapter The Eighties & Nineties (1980-1999) features a stunning, unsigned expansion bracelet and items from English retailers Butler & Wilson, where whimsy meets wannabe Cartiers.

If I have one complaint it's that when Tanenbaum profiles a designer and describes their jewelry, the photographs are not on the page. But I stumbled upon them as I continued to read the book. For example, one has to search for photos of the Pennino brothers, whose designs of pink gold sterling vermeil swirls sounded intriguing, but the pictures were only found later on in the book.

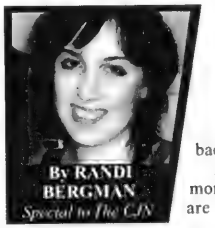
The dress returns with a vengeance



By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

This season, the most necessary object is the dress. Dominating runways across the globe, the dress is clearly back with a vengeance.

And what news could be more pleasantly received? Gone are the days of staring at your closet with glazed-over eyes, wondering if mixing hound's tooth with plaid is really that much of a faux pas. With the rebirth of the dress, this spring promises to be the easiest, breeziest in memory when it comes to deciding what to wear.

Above all, wearing a dress is the simplest way to make a fashion statement.

Dresses from the Miu Miu collection scream 1960s ingénue this season. They are brightly coloured, a little lacy and oh-so-short. On the runway, paired with peroxide wigs and oversized sunglasses, the dresses exemplified the recurring trend of the revamped mod. Since the mod movement is defined by the mini-dress, you'll need little else to get the mod look. Throw on some opaque tights, shiny flats and liquid liner and you're good to go.

> This spring promises to be the easiest, breeziest in memory when it comes to deciding what to wear

The modern dress also represents the recent reincarnation of classical femininity. This season, the Proenza Schouler collection features sweet-looking dresses. Brocaded silk, satin and lace are mixed to create a look that is sublime. With just a swish of such a dress, you'll turn heads faster than a speeding train. For a daytime look, pair your dress with flats and a cardigan. To take the dress into evening, slip on your favourite heels (bonus marks for round-toed Mary Janes) and grab a brightly coloured clutch.

The last lesson in thoroughly modernizing your look is as simple as this: belt, belt, belt it! The one thing you can never lose in this season's dress is your waist. Whether it's empire-high (preferably) or hipster-low, the cinched aspect of the dress is essential. To find the most fantastic belts, I recommend skipping Holt Renfrew's and heading to your local thrift shop, home to belts in colours and shapes a plenty at bargain prices. You can find snakeskin and suede belts for as low as 99 cents.

This season, forget layering T-shirt over tank over jeans. That certain je ne sais quoi can be found in the dress.

This column is dedicated to my loving mother, Carol Wise, who passed away peacefully last month after a long and courageous battle with cancer. My mother was an incredibly beautiful, talented and strong woman who overcame seemingly insurmountable challenges and set an example for us all. She will be greatly missed and it is an honour to write this article in her memory.

NEWS, NEWS, NEWS

Spring is in the air and with every season change comes a new look in makeup. Fruit has inspired the colour palette for spring this season with blends of exotic and sweet hues.

FROM HAIRSTYLIST MAURICE FIORIO: Spring is all about renewal and rejuvenation. This season, trends in colour are centred around blond and brunette in warm, rich tones. Red is out this spring, replaced by emphasis on tone-on-tone browns and blonds.

Long hair is still in. It goes well with the whole "bohemian" style of fashion. Long, textured locks are the "it" thing this spring. Because texture is so big for spring, textured, chemical services have been given a boost. To achieve that wavy, textured look, add a textured, chemical service to your next salon visit. If you don't want to go the chemical route but still want big, flowing hair, try styling aids such as mousse and texture spray as an alternative.

SKIN CARE

Chanel proudly introduces a new line of self-tanning products – Soleil Identité Perfect Colour Self Tanner, with an SPF 8. Available in golden for fair skin and bronze for darker skin tones, this moisturizing and protective cream gives a natural tan and a radiant, healthy glow.

Smashbox Cosmetics introduces Body Lights Glowing Lotion, an emollient bronze body lotion that lends a radiant natural glow to the skin and imparts a long-lasting fragrance.

Don't just moisturize – give skin a daily source of vitamin-enriched power, with Lancôme Laboratories' new Bienfait Multi-Vital, a complete daily moisturizer designed to fuel the skin with vitamins and protect with an essential anti-oxidant and a SPF 30 sunscreen.

To achieve soft and toned skin, try the Carol Baker Visage Tarocco Body Collection. The products are sure to leave your skin and hair soft and smooth.

Reveal yourself in a new skin with the Smoothing Body Scrub from Clarins. Enriched with bamboo powders, it provides a deep yet soft exfoliation as it detoxifies and protects the skin against hard water.

Marcelle invites you to make the most of your facial cleansing routine with the launch of its new Cleansing Cloths for gentle facial cleansing. Each pre-moistened cloth contains a gentle and moisturizing lotion designed to remove eye and face makeup.

NeoStrata unveils NeoStrata Daytime Smoothing Cream. It contains glycolic acid, which speeds up the skin's natural shedding process.

Skin cleansing has never been this refined. Lise Watier has introduced an outstanding and innovative line of cleansers and toners. The line features products for dry, oily, normal and combination skin and promises comforting and effective cleansing.

FOOT CARE

Vichy Laboratoires launches Podexine Podiatric Care, the solution for foot care. Treat callused feet with Podexine Callus Corrector, prevent and treat dry feet with Podexine Reconditioning Care for Dry Feet and treat cracked feet with Podexine Cracked Heel Repairer. Don't miss it – your feet will thank you.

HAIR

Mypa Cosmetics Inc. proudly launches Mypa Aloe Vera Therapy, a complete range of professional hair-care and skin-care treatments manufactured in Europe. For colour-treated hair, try the Shampoo and Hair Treatment Cream. There is also a fabulous Shampoo and Treatment Cream for very dry, brittle and damaged hair. Mypa also offers a conditioner to maintain hair volume and shine.

Goody revives jet-set glamour of the past with the Capri Chic Collection, chic hair accessories in nautical stripes, bold rich graphics and cool solids. They capture the carefree luxury and glamour that have made the Capri accessories timeless classics.

FOUNDATION

Smashbox Cosmetics unveils Soft Lights Bronzing Powder, two bronzing palettes to create the perfect glow all year round.

Pure is a quick and simple, three-step skin-care program from Maybelline for young women. Begin with the Pure Concealer, a gentle anti-acne treatment stick that conceals skin imperfections while it helps clear acne and prevent future break-outs. Next, use Pure Makeup, a shine-free foundation with water, and last, use Pure Powder, which gives a finish that outsmarts shine and soothes stressed skin.

LEG SHINE

Michael Kors' Leg Shine is available in two fabulous new tints, shimmer and bronze, which highlight in all the right places. But leg shine is not just for legs anymore – this scented, glimmering solid stick also adds sleek, sexy shimmer to bare shoulders or an exposed back.

BLUSH

Estée Lauder's new Limited Edition Exotic Shimmer All Over Highlighting Powder offer variations of pearl-kissed colour. Also from Estée Lauder, try Tender Blush to define, contour and highlight cheeks. It is a soft, natural blush with a fresh, clear colour.

Lise Watier introduces a new shade of Ménage à Trois blush, Coraline. Three colours flirt with coral to colour cheeks with unabashed charm.

Dejarose lipgloss from MAC

EYES

Create a new look with MAC's Violet Underground eye kohl pencil, and add a peachy Love-Bud Eye Shadow.

Outlined eyes are here to stay with the new Annabelle Liquid Eyeliners, available in four shades and two finishes. This quick-drying formula glides on effortlessly with the precise felt tip and stays true all day.

Lancôme has created Color Design in five families of eye shadows. With Color Design, the most daring women can show their colours. From dazzling sparkles and precious metals to holographic reflections, the eye shadows are a spectacular parade of colour fantasies and avant-garde textures.

For eyes that dare to be sexy, Estée Lauder introduces the Graphic Color Eye Shadow Quad. It is available in Charming Pink and the new limited-edition shade Sizzling Coral. More Than Mascara, also from Estée Lauder, has intense colour that is absolutely gorgeous as it defines, lengthens and conditions lashes. It comes in More Black, Green, Blue and Purple.

Caryl Baker Visage is introducing the new Brow Blend Compact. The compact contains three shades of neutral brown tones so that you can customize the shade and create full and shapely eyebrows.

LIPS

Energize the lips with MAC's all-new limited-edition bright red Poppy Hop or let the earthy vibe of Plant A Kiss take root where it thrives – on your lips! Also from MAC, be sure to try the new limited-edition Dejarose Lipglass, a light pink colour with a frost.

Rouge Wow, Fusion Creme Gloss, the brand-new coloured gloss from Lise Watier, is a gloss and a lipstick all in one that provides excellent coverage in one application. Lise Watier also introduces Rouge Toujours, Long-Wear Zero Transfer Lipstick, a new double-tip lipstick that provides colour coverage on one end and a transparent gloss on the other.

Tired of lip colour that fades shortly after application? Lips glow this spring with Estée Lauder's Pure Color Crystal Lipstick, a fig-scented lipstick that now boasts new fruity, shimmering shades. Take the frustration out of wearing lip colour with Estée Lauder's Double Wear Stay-In-Place Lip Duo. Lip colour won't bleed, feather or fade for up to eight hours.

Hugo Pure Purple: Whirlwind in a bottle

FRAGRANCE

Allure Sensuelle, a new fragrance from Chanel, is the sensuous and intimate interpretation of the original and always captivating Allure fragrance. Warm, voluptuous and mysterious, it is a soft floral oriental created by Jacque Poige, the internationally renowned "nose" of Chanel.

La Perla's newest fragrance, Charme, captivates, envelops and truly gratifies all the senses with a bottle that features a curvaceous design that reveals a vintage inspiration.

Roberto Cavalli introduces Serpentine, a bewitchingly exotic yet fresh scent that is constructed around the mango flower and holds the secret promise of ecstasy and seduction.

The new DKNY Red Delicious, his and hers fragrances are sultry, daring, tantalizing and completely irresistible. The sublime sensation of Red Delicious leaves you wanting more – another bite, another kiss.

Bvlgari is pleased to announce Eau Parfumée au The Rouge, a modern interpretation of an eau de Cologne that can be worn year-round by men and women.

Allure Sensuelle, new fragrance from Chanel

For a charming and captivating woman, Lancôme presents Hypnôse, a fragrance with a surprising and intriguing attitude.

Estée Lauder introduces Exotic Delicious and fresh new fragrance.

Hugo Pure Purple, from Hugo Boss, is exquisitely unpredictable. Inspired by the sheer, spontaneous energy that makes a woman want to dance, it is a fragrance bursting with scent notes that will keep you off your feet. It is a whirlwind in a bottle, an unbridled expression of feminine energy in all the beauty of its motion.

The Briars offers traditional spa services and holistic treatments

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

The Briars Spa, located at The Briars Resort and Conference Centre on Lake Simcoe in Jackson's Point, Ont., is just one hour north of Toronto. Under the direction of manager Terry Cranswick, the spa offers a full range of traditional spa services in addition to a number of innovative holistic treatments.

Spa Life

Cranswick and her staff of 18, which includes six estheticians, six registered massage therapists (RMT) and two alternative therapists, have created some therapies that are exclusive to their retreat. They include Scalp Hydrotherapy, which combines the use of water shower jets, acupressure and aromatherapy conditioners.

"All our staff is trained in the body and hydro treatments, but if someone particularly wanted an RMT to do that treatment, they would have to request it then," says Cranswick. "We are very fortunate that some of our RMTs are our reflexologists and have also taken hot-stone massage. Reflexology is a massage of the internal organs by massaging little points at the feet.

"We have a full range of esthetic treatments – manicures, pedicures, facials and some waxing, the underarm, bikini and face. Our RMTs do Swedish, deep-tissue and rhythmic massages, which is really good for the elderly because it is more of a rocking motion than the deep tissue massage, which may be a little too much for them."

At The Briar Spa, there are a number of facials on offer, using Phytomer products. They include the Natural Beauty Facial, For Men Only, Skin Quenching Facial for hydrating, Extended Youth Facial to combat aging, Sensitive Defence Facial and the Purifying Facial for those wanting to detoxify. For Double the Pleasure, one therapist ministers a Natural Beauty Facial, while another works at your feet doing reflexology. Double the Pleasure is also available with the Scalp Hydrotherapy in place of the facial.

Holistic treatments at the spa include reflexology, cranial-sacral work and reiki – a Japanese technique that calls for the laying of hands by the therapist to reduce stress and encourage relaxation. Signature treatments include chakra balancing, which is a treatment and an interactive workshop that explores the blockages of your karmic pattern.

Not to be missed is Lomi 'Oluli (Hawaiian massage). The two-hour treatment is enhanced by Hawaiian musical rhythms playing loudly in the background while the therapist's flowing massage movements on the body are reminiscent of a hula dancer. This exotic treatment aligns the body, mind and spirit.

The most popular day-spa package The Briars offers is Escape on the Lake. It includes a facial, Swedish massage and pedicure. All-day packages include a recreation pass that allows access to the indoor solarium pool, whirlpool and sauna, and the outdoor pool in the summer. Overnight packages include a $100 credit to be used toward your choice of spa treat.

The spa walls are aquamarine. There are wicker furnishings in the waiting area. On the walls are watercolours collected by the Sibbald family, who have owned The Briars since 1878. The spa has a rural atmosphere, although the modern lighting fixtures give The Briars Spa a contemporary country feel. There are six treatment rooms, including a manicure/pedicure area set up to handle three clients all at the same time. This area includes the hydro room, with its six-jet shower for hydrotherapies such as body wraps and polishes.

A few steps up from the spa's small but impressive retail area are two large rooms – one is used as a treatment room for two clients at the same time, and the other room is used for treatments that require a larger space.

The picturesque year-round resort, a member of Ontario's Finest Inns, Premier Spas of Ontario and Resorts Ontario, sits on 200 acres. There are 78 rooms; a one, two-bedroom suite; eight, two-bedroom cottages; and four studio cottages. There are four tennis courts and an 18-hole golf course. Canoes, kayaks, sunfish sailboats and pedal boats are available. There is swimming at the waterfront, as well as biking, walking trails, cross-country skiing and horse-drawn sleigh rides.

Other programs offered are guided nature and historical walks and yoga. Entertainment is featured on holidays and Friday nights. On Saturday evenings, you can dance to music played by a DJ.

The Briars does not provide kosher meals but will gladly store all food that visitors bring up to the resort.

To contact The Briars, 55 Hedge Rd., RR1, Jackson's Point, L0E 1L0, call toll free 1-800-465-2376 or visit www.briars.ca.

Man dies six days after shul fire

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — One of two men injured in a March 10 fire at a Montreal synagogue succumbed to his injuries last week.

Aharon Ben Hanna Chekory had been in a coma for six days before dying March 16. He and another worshipper at the Centre Merkaz Sepharade jumped from a window on the second floor, where services were conducted, after a fire erupted in the kitchen of the century-old structure in Côte-des-Neiges.

Thirteen other congregants escaped without injury.

Blaze caused by electrical problems in kitchen

According to fire department spokesperson Rick Leckner, Ben Hanna Chekory suffered a severe skull fracture. The other congregant broke his femur bone.

The synagogue expressed its "deep sadness" at the death of Ben Hanna Chekory, who was reportedly in his 70s, and it invited members of the Jewish community to pay its respects at March 17 funeral services.

Despite reports the synagogue had been vandalized three time in the previous month, fire officials concluded that electrical problems triggered the three-alarm blaze, which erupted at 6:45 p.m. and took 75 firefighters more than an hour to quell. However, they were able to limit extensive damage to the first floor.

"It was accidental in nature," Leckner said.

Firefighters were able to salvage five Torah scrolls from the shul, which erupted in flames less than an hour after the start of Shabbat. Besides the fatality, the blaze caused thousands of dollars in damage.

The structure has housed the congregation for almost 50 years.

Leckner said that while it was not initially apparent to firefighters that the building served as a synagogue, the fire crew consulted with the rabbi and "organized a 'rescue' of the synagogue's Torahs."

Two white supremacists fined for spreading hate on the net

Online messages included jokes about the Holocaust

TORONTO — Two white supremacists violated Canada's hate laws by posting offensive material about blacks and Jews on the Internet, the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal ruled earlier this month.

In a decision released March 10, the tribunal said the now-defunct websites contained messages that exposed non-Christians and non-whites to "hatred and contempt."

The tribunal ordered the men, one of whom ran the web-hosting service that carried the sites, to stop spreading hate, imposed fines totalling $13,000 and awarded $5,000 to the complainant, Ottawa human rights lawyer Richard Warman.

It was the first time a Canadian Internet web-hosting service was found financially liable for hate messages.

One of the men, Alexan Kulbashian of Toronto, ran a web-hosting service, AffordableSpace.com, that carried the messages. The ruling also ordered the service shut down.

Kulbashian and the other man, James Richardson of London, Ont., were associated with the "Canadian Ethnic Cleansing Team" and www.tri-cityskins.com, which carried neo-Nazi and white supremacist material.

The two men were each fined $1,000, the Canadian Ethnic Cleansing Team was fined $3,000, and AffordableSpace.com was fined $3,000.

Warman was awarded $5,000 because he was the subject of personal attacks on the website.

The online messages included jokes about the Holocaust and songs about blacks, Jews, Muslims, Sikhs and other minorities.

"Black persons and people of the Jewish faith are particularly laid open to ridicule, ill feelings or hostility, creating the right conditions for hatred or contempt against them to flourish," the 48-page ruling states.

Warman, who launched the complaint in early 2002, told Canadian Press he was "ecstatic" about the decision. "It shows human rights laws work."

He has had several more cases before the tribunal.

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, said the judgment "makes a huge and important statement."

He said the sites in question were "ugly, vile and brutal."

The tribunal has shut down Internet sites in a half-dozen cases in the past few years.

The first major Internet-related decision came in 2002, when it forced Holocaust-denier Ernst Zundel to close his website.

This week, Canadian Jewish Congress is expected to unveil a link on its website (www.cjc.ca) to which the public may report hate-related websites and other online activity.

The link was expected to coincide with the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination on March 21.

SASKATOON PURIM PARTY

The hall of Congregation Agudas Israel was converted into a Mediterranean wonderland for the Saskatoon Jewish community's Purim Shanty Panty Hafla the night of March 12. More than 100 people dressed as characters from the Bible, feasted on Israeli food, watched – and took part in – belly-dancing, and participated in a drum circle.

Anne Frank cast work well together

By BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

Putting on a new version of The Diary Of Anne Frank is not easy. By now, Anne Frank has a place in every Jewish person's psyche. We've read the book, a lot of us have seen the play and others have been to the attic where Anne hid during the Holocaust.

Stage Centre Productions, a 30-year-old theatre company that produces plays at the Fairview Library Theatre, chose the updated Broadway version of The Diary of Anne Frank as the second-last show of its 2005-2006 season. Although it's slightly different than the first version by Albert Hackett (the new adaptation is more explicit about Anne going through puberty), the play maintains much of the authenticity of the original.

It's hard to get excited about the script because it's all familiar. We know when Dr. Dussel gets added to the attic and how Anne and Peter's relationship will develop, but thanks to some stellar acting, especially from Monica Paraghamian who plays Anne Frank, the production succeeds.

Paraghamian is young, vibrant and dripping with talent. Unlike some of the other actors, the first-year university student plays this difficult role with ease. Her timing is flawless, making the audience laugh at times and bringing them to tears on other occasions. Paraghamian is given a lot of dialogue – Anne gets criticized repeatedly for talking too much – but she never misses a beat.

Monica Paraghamiam as Anne Frank.

Unfortunately, some of the other acting is not as memorable. Brian Kipping, who plays Otto Frank, looked more like Marlon Brando circa 1995 than Anne's lanky father. His delivery seemed forced, and he wasn't particularly believable.

But he wasn't the only one who faltered. Bob Martyn failed to give Mr. Dussel any personality. The grumpy dentist came across as always upset, always outraged. There was nothing sensitive or likable about Dussel, even when opportunities afforded Martyn to play with Dussel's emotions.

Still, some of the best parts of the play come when all eight actors have the chance to feed off each other. Many scenes called for the actors to argue and create a sense of urgency that's unique to the Holocaust, which they did effortlessly.

In one particularly engaging scene, Mr. Van Daam (played by Alan Washbrook) is caught stealing bread. Immediately, things become tense. Mr. Van Daam runs away, crying with guilt, while Mrs. Frank (Rita Lynham) berates the Van Daams for their selfishness. It is also the first time in the story that Mrs. Frank stands up for her family, to Anne's surprise.

That highly emotional scene serves to portray the housemates' frustration with each other and their situation, and without the right mix of anger and tension, it could fall flat. But, as with many other scenes, the cast handled this complex act with respect and integrity. It was clear that the actors, many of whom are not Jewish, studied the story and carefully crafted their characters to present an accurate account of what happened.

In addition to staying true to the characters, the play paid careful attention to the attic's esthetics. The stage was sufficiently cramped, not unlike the actual attic, and all the characters wore authentic 1940s clothing. Detail was clearly important to Stage Centre Productions' artistic director. He researched what type of cake someone in Holland would eat during the 1940s, and then had someone bake it for the Franks and Van Daams to eat on New Year's.

This is an excellent performance for those who haven't read The Diary of Anne Frank. The production stays true to Anne's story and struggle and will send the audience home satisfied. However, if you have seen the play, watching this production is somewhat redundant. The Stage Centre doesn't add anything new to the story, and with one actor stealing the show, the performances don't outweigh the familiarity.

The play is on until March 25 at the Fairview Library Theatre, 35 Fairview Mall Drive, Toronto. 416-299-5557.

Pianist Robert Silverman strikes a chord with audiences

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When his fingers dance along the piano keys, Robert Silverman isn't merely focused on creating beautiful music – he's out to strike a resounding chord with the audience.

"If there's anything that characterizes my playing, it seems to be that audiences get drawn in," says the famed pianist.

"I reach into the music and if people can also communicate with the music, then I've done my job."

A job well done has been Silverman's signature throughout his illustrious career, which includes 25-plus CD recordings, a Juno nomination, sold-out concerts on four continents and winning the Paul de Hueck and Norman Walford Career Achievement Award for keyboard artistry.

A buzz is now swirling in Toronto in anticipation of his upcoming solo recital on March 28 at 8 p.m., presented by the Koffler Centre for the Arts, School of Music, where he is artist-in-residence.

"I love performing in Toronto… and I welcome the opportunity to be affiliated with the Jewish community there," says Silverman in an interview from his home in Vancouver.

The recital program features works by Chopin, Debussy and Mozart.

The 67-year-old former University of British Columbia (UBC) School of Music director began playing at the age of four

"My parents, Abe and Fanny, liked music and they noticed they had a little kid who was tuning into the radio and always stopped to listen when there was good music on," Silverman recalls.

"We also lived next door to a piano teacher, so I started to take lessons."

As fortune would have it, this music teacher, Esther Breitman, was the mother of Dorothy Morton, Silverman's piano teacher throughout his youth.

Although it was crystal-clear Silverman was precocious he played with the Montreal Symphony when he was only 14 – the musical whiz didn't aspire to be a professional until he was a university student.

Performance creating a buzz in Toronto

In fact, he initially studied engineering

"At some point or other, I just decided engineering wasn't for me," he says.

"When I graduated, I went off to study piano in Vienna and it went very well."

During most of the 1960s and early '70s, Silverman lived in the United States, studying and teaching music, as well as recording some LPs.

His first big break came in 1967, when he won a piano competition and followed that up with some recordings.

"I recorded with a company that specialized in music that hadn't already been recorded," Silverman says.

"I wouldn't want to have to eat on the money they earned, but they were good recordings and they got a lot of attention."

In time, Silverman was a top choice for recordings, as well as concerts, and in 1973, a position opened up at UBC.

So he happily returned to Canada to launch a successful teaching career that lasted three decades.

"I'm very fond of saying that I'm a better pianist because I have taught," Silverman says.

"It's not only for the obvious reason of helping talented students develop, but also, teaching has forced me to think and intellectualize about the piano and music in a way that I might not have done if I wasn't teaching."

After a rewarding and prolific teaching career, Silverman is now dedicating his time to recordings and concerts.

Chopin, Debussy and Mozart

Marquis Classics recently released his latest CD, Starry, Starry Night, a compilation of 24 pieces with a nighttime theme running through the songs.

"Nighttime has always intrigued creative artists," Silverman notes on his website.

"In the 19th and early 20th centuries, composers like Chopin, Liszt, Schumann, Debussy and Ravel enriched the piano repertoire with dazzling portrayals of nighttime's diverse sounds, moods, hues and scents."

To commemorate the 250th anniversary of Mozart's birth, Silverman will be playing a series of shows this year in several cities, including Vancouver, Kitchener and Winnipeg, highlighting the composer's sonatas.

And count on seeing more of him in Toronto in the near future.

"I'm starting a series next year in Toronto called Music From Inside Out, in which I'll be doing a series of recitals based on a certain theme… where I'll be both playing and talking about the music," he says.

For more information about the upcoming concert, call 416-636-1880, ext. 228, or e-mail kofflermusic@bjcc.ca.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

ART OR INVASION OF PRIVACY?

A U.S. Supreme Court judge has dismissed a lawsuit by an elderly chassidic man, ruling that copies of a photograph of him obtained surreptitiously on a public street are art, not commerce, and may continue to be sold for large sums because they are protected by the First Amendment.

Erno Nussenzweig, a retired diamond dealer from New Jersey, inadvertently stepped into a photographic setup near New York's Times Square, allowing award-winning photographer Philip-Lorca diCorcia to capture a head shot of him. The photo shows him facing almost directly into the camera, sporting a scraggly white beard, black hat and black coat.

DiCorcia included a three-by-four-foot print of Nussenzweig in "Heads," an exhibition of photographs of 17 subjects taken without their knowledge that was shown at New York's Chelsea Gallery in 2001. He has sold 10 individual prints for about US $20,000 to $30,000 (US) each.

Nussenzweig's son reportedly discovered the photograph in a catalogue of diCorcia's work in a bookstore last year. The Hungarian-born Holocaust survivor alleged in his lawsuit that his privacy was invaded and that his image was used unlawfully for commercial purposes.

Although New York's right-to-privacy law prohibits usage for commerce, the law does not apply if the likeness is considered art. Nussenzweig's lawyer is planning to appeal.

Hochschild Wins Gelber Prize: Adam Hochschild has won the Lionel Gelber Prize for Bury the Chains: Prophets and Rebels in the Fight to Free an Empire's Slaves (Houghton Mifflin), a book that examines the dark and disturbing world of the international slave trade in the late 1700s and 1800s.

A California university instructor in journalism, Hochschild is due to accept the $15,000 award and give a public lecture at the University of Toronto's Munk Centre on April 4.

Referring to the last decades of the 1700s, Hochschild writes: "If, early that year, you had stood on a London street corner and insisted that slavery was morally wrong and should be stopped, nine out of 10 listeners would have laughed you off as a crackpot."

He is the first repeat winner of the prize, which the Toronto-based Lionel Gelber Foundation awards to the year's best foreign policy book in partnership with the Munk Centre and Washington-based Foreign Policy magazine. He also won in 1999 for King Leopold's Ghost: A Story of Greed, Terror and Heroism in Colonial Africa.

Performance combines classical, jazz, klezmer music and dance

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

For most mainstream music fans – especially younger ones – classical music is not their sound of choice.

But acclaimed pianist Andrew Burashko wants to change that.

As the artistic director of the Art of Time Ensemble, a chamber music society, Burashko is endeavouring to present this rich form of music in a contemporary and exciting manner.

"There is so much convention and formality associated with classical music – from the way people dress to the way they behave," says the Toronto resident.

"But this music expresses all kinds of things that other music doesn't. It's incredibly intense and passionate… and if people are able to open themselves up to it, it will make an impact on them that other kinds of music just can't do."

Burashko's approach is to intermingle classical music with other genres and art forms.

To that end, the Art of Time Ensemble will be performing a dynamic program at 8 p.m. on March 24 and 25 at Harbourfront Centre Theatre. The performance incorporates classical music, jazz, klezmer and choreographed dances, as well as film and literature.

"Every program we have done has been a new experiment in sort of mixing genres," he says.

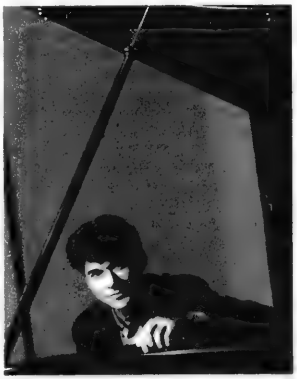
"It's all about making classical music more accessible to more people and getting them to let their guard down."

The event at Harbourfront, titled Shostakovich: A Centenary Celebration, showcases the works of Dimitri Shostakovich, the famed Russian composer, marking 100 years since his birth.

"Shostakovich had a lot of very close Jewish friends and he embraced Jewish music," notes Burashko.

"His music is incredibly powerful and moving."

As part of the performance, live and recorded excerpts of letters Shostakovich penned will be read aloud.



Andrew Burashko

"Unless the audience already listens to Shostakovich or classical music, it's very foreign to them," Burashko says.

"Having text [read] creates a context… in terms of the music itself – where it came from, the time and place."

Born in Moscow to a family of musicians, Burashko came to Canada as a child.

The piano was a major part of his life from an early age.

By age 17, he made his debut with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra.

But after completing high school, Burashko began questioning his desire to pursue a musical career and took a year off from the piano.

"It was all tied up with rebellion," he relates.

"[Playing the piano didn't] seem fun anymore when you're made to do it."

The absence away from the instrument actually made his heart grow fonder for it and when he returned to the piano, he did so on his own terms, quite contentedly.

Since then, Burashko has cemented a reputation as one of the great soloists and chamber contributors.

He has played throughout North America and Europe, has recorded on three different labels and is regularly heard on CBC Radio.

His true labour of love, though, is the Art of Time Ensemble.

When it started up in 1998, the project was relatively small in scope.

But now, Burashko is shifting it into high gear.

"This year has been a huge experiment," he says.

"We've had two events that were both well attended and I'm hoping for more growth and momentum."

For tickets, call the Harbourfront Centre box office at 416-973-4000.

Holocaust memoirs from Ukraine and Poland

There Is an Apple in My Freezer: A True Story by Zanetta Nestel, JPN Books..

At the Mercy of Strangers: Survival in Nazi-Occupied Poland by Gitel Hopfeld, Mosaic Press.

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

On Oct. 12, 1941, a day of bloody infamy, the Nazis massacred about 12,000 Jews in the Jewish cemetery in the Ukrainian town of Stanislawow, also known as Ivanofrankivsk. But as evening drew nigh, the weary killers halted the carnage, providing an unintended reprieve to another 6,000 Jews, including Zanetta Nestel, the author of There Is an Apple in My Freezer: A True Story and her infant daughter.

Reminiscent of the biblical Hagar or a modern Jewish madonna and child, Nestel and her baby subsequently survived many harrowing incidents before reaching the blessed freedom of Canada about 1948. This memoir, published more than half a century later, recounts the perpetual danger, numbing hunger, gruelling hardships, impossible hopes and bitter disappointments of those years in which many ordinary people variously became saints or monsters.

"What was it that miraculously enabled me to survive?" Nestel, who became a successful artist in Canada, muses. "Obviously, it was a combination of resourcefulness, perseverance, the good fortune of being with good people at the right time and, most importantly of all, the strength that came from refusing to give up my child."

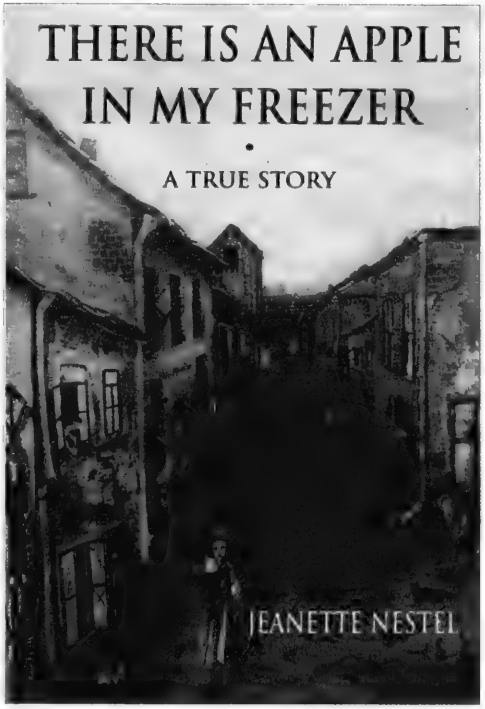
Nestel was married at 18. Her husband left for the Russian army and word soon reached her that he had been killed. Establishing a ghetto, the Germans required all single mothers to marry or get a job; in desperation, she begged her cousin, a doctor, for assistance. He put a stethoscope, thermometer and other instruments into a medical bag and gave it to her along with a notarized note that she was an independent registered nurse.

This was the first of her various impersonations, the most useful of which required her to learn to pray as a Catholic. Escaping from the ghetto, she often found herself at the mercy of blackmailers, rogues, suspicious neighbours and others only too willing to finger her to the authorities. Just securing food and shelter for herself and others often meant routine exposure to extreme risks.

Born Zanetta Plesser, Nestel witnessed cruel atrocities; passed miraculously through checkpoints with false papers; bluffed her way out of numerous certain-death situations; stole bread and blankets to survive; and bravely endangered herself to save lives. Every page of her memoir conveys the notion of a world gone crazy, of humanity at an abysmal low. In the midst of one close escape she "vowed that if I got out of this alive I would leave this snake-pit country as soon as I could," and the reader cries out a hearty "amen!"

Her tale is filled with irony. In one episode, she and several others were confronted by armed Jewish partisans in the woods, one of whom pointed a gun at her. "I was in a terrible predicament," she writes. "I wanted to tell them that I was Jewish, but I didn't dare in the presence of Felicia and Mr. Poplinki, who surely would report me later." Conversely, once the war is over, some Jews accused her of being a German or a collaborator because of her rusty Yiddish.

In Nestel's eyes, Soviet forces and Polish clerks processed the survivors of the Majdanek concentration camp in a highly bureaucratic and uncaring fashion. Ragged partisans and even more ragged former prisoners were lumped together to wait in line for aid. Among the more pitiful episodes that she records is one involving a human "heap of rags and bones" who comes forward for help:



"The clerk laughed a superior sneer that I had heard before, usually coming from individuals in positions of power.

"'And what does a Jew want?' he asked.

"'A place to live,' came the answer.

"'Where have you been up to now?'

" 'In the wheat.'

"'Ah, in the wheat, eh? Who is stopping you from staying there now?'

"'The wheat has been cut down,' the man replied."

This tragic figure was met with derision and impatience on all fronts. Upon being told, "Go, go, where you belong," he meekly shuffled away with a "crazy smile" on his face.

Nestel records her chance meeting with the husband she thought was dead (he had chosen not to answer her letters) and her encounter with the Russian soldier, Julius Nestel, who would eventually become her husband. She and Julius were planning to go to Palestine but chose to stay behind rather than submit to a requirement that her daughter travel separately with a group of war orphans. Israel's loss was Canada's gain.

Nestel and her grown daughter later revisited the various scenes of their odyssey, including an orchard where she had picked sour apples to eat; more apples were waiting for her, thus explaining the book's title.

Another recent Holocaust memoir published locally is At the Mercy of Strangers; Survival in Nazi-Occupied Poland by Gitel Hopfeld. The author recalls how she and her two children survived the Shoah through the acts of bravery by priests, farmers, a railway station master and other merciful strangers. The book was originally written in Polish; the translator and editor is Simcha Simchovitch, the distinguished Toronto writer-poet, who is Hopfeld's nephew.

Mourning traditions 'a template,' rabbi says

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

Grief is like a Slinky, said Rabbi Yossi Sapirman, demonstrating what he meant using an actual Slinky in front of a packed auditorium recently at Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

When a loss is first experienced, the Slinky of grief is coiled tight, and the pain is constant, he said.

Over time, it stretches more and more, getting so stretched that you may hardly notice it after a while. But occasionally – on dates such as anniversaries, birthdays, holidays – it snaps back tight again. Then, the stretching begins anew. It never goes away.

Rabbi Sapirman, spiritual leader of Beth Torah Congregation, spoke Feb. 26 at a talk titled "The Mourning After," this year's annual free Marsha Goldstein Quiles memorial shiur (class). Goldstein Quiles was the late sister of Kolel rabbinic director Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, and in her introduction, Rabbi Goldstein spoke of her sister's strong belief in "talking about Judaism in a non-coercive way."

Rabbi Sapirman, who credited Rabbi Goldstein with the Slinky metaphor, began with a comprehensive overview of Jewish mourning traditions, and went on to describe contemporary variations on them from his own experience as a congregational rabbi.

"It's not the rabbi's job to be rigid to traditions," he said. "There are degrees of observance. There's room for individual expression."

He gave a number of examples.

When a healthy young man was murdered in his prime, his family couldn't bring themselves to let go. Instead of using the traditional shovels, with Rabbi Sapirman's blessing, the family buried the man by hand – literally placing dirt in his grave by the handful. That time-consuming process, Rabbi Sapirman said, served to make the loss more real and help them achieve closure.

Another family lost a young baby within 30 days of the child's birth, before full mourning customs are observed. The challenge, he said, was to "find a way the parents could express their intense grief" while not performing all the rituals they would for an adult. Because kriah, the ceremonial tearing of a garment or ribbon, isn't done for a newborn, the parents chose to write their eulogy, then tear the paper it was written on and place it in the grave.

Other innovations may also bring comfort, such as music or singing at a funeral.

However, Rabbi Sapirman said, some contemporary practices may actually hinder the difficult "work of mourning."

He said he's "not a fan" of the three-day shivah and suggests instead that families sit for seven days, but perhaps observe three days of "public" shivah and keep the last four days private.

"[Mourning] traditions are a template," he said, noting the wisdom behind small traditional gestures such as serving eggs, a symbol of life, to mourners.

"We use simple things to get through difficult times."

There is also power in the traditional Hebrew phrase, "May you be comforted among the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem," as well as the public recognition of mourners in synagogue.

Some popular traditions are simply misguided, Rabbi Sapirman said, such as throwing out the shoes of a deceased loved one, which is nowhere in the original halachah and can lead to thousands of dollars in waste, "instead of giving [the shoes] to someone who needs them."

Rabbi Sapirman said every spiritual leader has pastoral moments they don't look forward to, such as his recent responsibility to eulogize 25-year-old murder victim Alicia Ross.

"A rabbi is called upon to have words, and there are no words," he said.

He offered advice for planning a meaningful eulogy. Mourners needn't be bound by formalities: be creative, mention anything respectful that comes to mind. He said he always asks families "what else are you thinking of?" to trigger memories they might not think to include. "Say what you want to hear on that day: 'She was a mensch. He was a true, true tzaddik.'"

He also raised the difficult question of what to say to mourners. "It's not our job to distract the mourner," such as by telling jokes at a shivah. Sometimes, it's enough to just sit quietly and wait for them to begin speaking.

Rabbi Sapirman noted that mourning must always come to an end. While a mourner remains separate in some ways for a full year, once that period is over, "opting out is no longer possible… you are not allowed to mourn."

Group advocates for special needs young adults

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

A group of Jewish parents who have teenage or young adult children with special needs has formed a new advocacy group that is trying to create a working and living environment for them in the Greater Toronto Area.

Called DANI – short for Developing and Nurturing Independence Parent Advocacy Group – the group aims to help young adults aged 21 and over, regardless of their religious affiliation, financial status or ability.

Its goals in the next two to four years, are, among other things, to create kosher homes for people, where they would receive the level of support they need; a factory-type, sheltered workshop where kosher food products can be made or seasonal work done; a kosher coffee house with a bakery attached; an arts and crafts gift shop; integrated work placement opportunities for individuals who can benefit from this; and guided work placement for individuals who need more help.

Kathy Laszlo, the mother of a 19-year-old son, Danny, who has special needs, spearheaded the group's formation.

It's a big project, "but everything has to start with a dream," she says. "It's necessary, because once our kids reach age 21, there is nothing out there for them. They're entitled to nothing but a disability pension."

Many of these young adults want to live on their own in the community, she says, but existing agencies serve families in crisis first, because the waiting list for homes is so long.

"We don't want to wait for a crisis. We don't want our kids in emergency placement. We want to make sure they get proper placement and remain part of the Jewish community."

The group has invited various agencies to come and speak to group members, she says, "and we're told repeatedly that the only solution is to try and do something ourselves. It is the only way to go."

Laszlo would like to see community members get involved in the project. "I envision young retirees shadowing individuals as they go about their work, and other volunteers shadowing our kids as they take part in social programs."

Laszlo started the advocacy group, but she says "its membership is strong and growing by the minute. We're all working hard because we're in the same shoes."

She plans to begin fundraising within the Jewish community for the group's projects. "A community is not measured by how many shuls it has, but rather, how it cares for its vulnerable members."

Are UNRWA staffers neutral or partisan?

By MICHAEL T. JORDAN
JTA

There may be no greater test of the United Nations' vaunted neutrality than to be a Palestinian staffer of the United Nations Relief and Works Agency in Gaza or the West Bank.

UNRWA has 12,000-plus employees in those areas – where it's the second-largest employer after the Palestinian Authority – and similar numbers in camps in Jordan, Lebanon and Syria. In all, more than 99 per cent of its staff members are Palestinian.

No other UN agency boasts such an overwhelming ratio of local to foreign field staff. And nine of 10 UNRWA employees are themselves refugees, the agency says.

UNRWA employees and their families in the Palestinian territories go through everything that society at large endures, which during the intifadah meant the self-described "daily humiliations" of restricted movement, material deprivation and Israeli anti-terrorist raids.

Nevertheless, UNRWA employees must sign a code of conduct that compels them to avoid actions that "may adversely affect on their status, or on the integrity, independence and impartiality which are required by that status."

Realistically, though, some observers ask: would it be surprising if UNRWA employees were to loathe Israel and embrace the Palestinian cause – and have it influence their work?

Some of UNRWA's harsher critics speak as if the agency were actively complicit in terrorism, but others say the situation isn't black and white. With lawlessness, intimidation and violence now widespread – UNRWA itself has relocated some international staff from Gaza to Jerusalem – Palestinian staff members may simply find it prudent to avert their eyes from the militancy around them.

UNRWA officials note that the UN General Assembly never gave the agency policing or intelligence-gathering responsibilities in its camps. Moreover, UNRWA officials say, it could be dangerous to ask too many questions about what's going on around them.

Yet staff certainly can make a difference, says Astrid Van Genderen Stort, a spokesperson for the UN High Commission for Refugees, which takes care of the world's 19 million non-Palestinian refugees.

In some cases, Van Genderen Stort says, UNHCR teams with local military, police or foreign peacekeepers to look out for armed elements stirring up trouble. In other cases, camp residents have established something of a "night watch."

"It's not that we have intelligence on the ground or that they're spying on their neighbours, but they know who's in their community and they keep an eye out," says Van Genderen Stort, who recently worked in Liberia's refugee camps. "We of course want to help only those who are refugees and in need of help. We don't want to be an agency that helps rebels who go out at night and fight."

When it comes to UNRWA, at least some staffers seem to share their clients' more extreme views.

The UNRWA teachers' union, for example, reportedly is dominated by members affiliated with Hamas, listed as a terror organization in much of the West. Observers have cited numerous instances where suicide bombers and other terrorists were glorified in UNRWA schools, whether through graffiti on school walls or posters in the classrooms.

In one incident, Hamas convened a July 2001 conference in an UNRWA junior high school in Gaza's Jabalya refugee camp.

"The road to Palestine passes through the blood of the fallen, and these fallen have written history with parts of their flesh and their bodies," one UNRWA teacher, Saheil Alhinadi, said in praise of "martyrdom," a euphemism for suicide terrorism.

The former UNRWA chief, Peter Hansen, got into hot water in October 2004 when he told CBC Television, "I'm sure there are Hamas members on the UNRWA payroll, and I don't see that as a crime. Hamas as a political organization does not mean that every member is a militant, and we do not do political vetting and exclude people from one persuasion as against another."

Hansen later explained to JTA that he meant Hamas sympathizers, not members.

"Don't judge people by what you think they may or may not believe. Judge them by what they do, in their actions and in their behaviour," he told JTA. "And there we get back to the very strict behaviour code we have in the agency for what staff members are to do and not to do in their behaviour."

Israel, however, says the question isn't just staff members' political allegiances but, sometimes, their actions.

In recent years, Israel has arrested dozens of UNRWA staffers – 31 from mid-2004 to mid-2005 alone, according to UNRWA – for alleged involvement in terrorism and other activities. Most are released within days or weeks, without charges – but not all.

Nahed Attalah, an UNRWA official arrested by Israeli forces in 2002, reportedly confessed to using his UN travel permit and his UNRWA car to transport terrorists to attack sites, and to entering Syria and Lebanon to arrange weapons purchases for terrorist groups.

In August 2002, Israel arrested UNRWA ambulance driver Nidal Abd Al Fatah Abdallah Nazal, whom officials later said confessed to being a Hamas member and using his ambulance to transport arms and messages to Hamas activists.

In 2003, Israel convicted three staffers: a Hamas member got 32 months for having a machine gun and delivering chemicals to a bomb-maker; an Islamic Jihad member received 2½ years for possessing materials for possible use in explosives; and a third person was sentenced to 7½ years for shooting a gun and firebombing an Israeli bus.

In May 2004, Israeli television showed gunmen piling into an UNRWA ambulance.

UNRWA officials say it's unfair to tarnish an organization of thousands for the actions of a few. They also claim the Israeli judicial system is biased, with UNRWA denied access to both detainees and the evidence against them – so they're skeptical about staff arrests and convictions.

Even a former Israeli diplomat chastises his government's policy of claiming to have a smoking gun that proves UNRWA's terrorist links, then withholding the evidence on grounds of "national security." That fuels speculation that Israel doesn't have the goods, the diplomat said.

"When the UN asks for proof and Israel says it's classified, to me, that's like not having any evidence at all," the official, who requested anonymity, told JTA.

The most notorious instance occurred in early October 2004, when Israel announced it had footage of a Qassam rocket being loaded into an UNRWA ambulance. UNRWA asserted that the object in question was a rolled-up stretcher.

After further scrutiny, Israel conceded it had blundered – it was indeed a stretcher. But the incident reflected how, after years of tension with UNRWA, Israel was inclined to believe the worst about the agency.

Even UNRWA leaders, however, admit their camps are heavily militarized.

"Of course I don't condone it, but it's a fact of life," Hansen said of the presence of heavily armed militants at an agency function, according to Associated Press. "Look around the camp. We can't stop it. We don't have guns."

As Hansen later confided to the Danish paper Politiken, "Who in this camp dares to speak up against an armed man?"

Though UN resolutions require armed elements to steer clear of refugee camps, Karen Koning AbuZayd conceded, in an August 2002 Jerusalem Report story, that expelling gunmen from the camps would be "difficult in this region."

In Gaza and the West Bank, everything is "upside down. The refugees are the armed elements," said AbuZayd, who at the time of the interview was Hansen's deputy and who has now succeeded him.

Then there are instances of Palestinian violence that target UNRWA itself.

Last August, three UNRWA staffers – two Europeans and a Palestinian – were kidnapped in the Khan Younis camp in Gaza by what UNRWA described as a "militant group." UNRWA protested, and the staffers were released later in the day, unharmed.

On New Year's Day 2006, Palestinians firebombed the UN club in Gaza City, which flies the UNRWA flag and is said to be the only establishment in town that serves alcohol, drawing the ire of Islamic fundamentalists. The club's guard was tied up and beaten.

UNRWA staffers who venture into the fray may risk repercussions.

In April 2004, Israel's assassination of Hamas leaders Sheik Ahmed Yassin and Abdel-Aziz Rantissi sparked an outpouring of emotion among Palestinian refugees in Lebanon.

According to the Daily Star of Beirut, the UNRWA chief in Lebanon, Richard Cook, ordered his staff to go into agency schools and tear down posters glorifying "martyrdom." Refugee leaders declared Cook persona non grata and reportedly barred him briefly from the camps.

"We have to take the safety of our staff into account," AbuZayd explained to the Report in her 2002 interview. "If we were to ask our staff to do certain things, we realize that would get them into big trouble."

At the very least, the United States expects UNRWA to speak up. Washington is UNRWA's largest donor, providing about 30 per cent of the agency's roughly $400 million (US) budget in both 2004 and 2005.

Section 301(c) of the 1961 U.S. Foreign Assistance Act compels UNRWA to "take all possible measures to assure that no part of the United States contribution shall be used to furnish assistance to any refugee who is receiving military training as a member of the so-called Palestine Liberation Army or any other guerrilla type organization or who has engaged in any act of terrorism."

That pressure to vet seems to make the UNRWA hierarchy squirm.

In a November 2003 report, the U.S. General Accounting Office noted that UNRWA balked at the obligation to report what staff members see and hear, "owing to concerns for its staff's safety" and the "inability to verify beneficiary responses."

UNRWA's lawyers countered with a proposal that staffers not "knowingly" provide assistance to those involved with terrorist activities – a standard that critics say sets the bar too high, allowing for plausible deniability.

But UNRWA's request that the U.S. Congress clarify the meaning of "all possible measures" is a cop-out, said Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, a Florida republican who chairs the House of Representatives' committee on international relations' Middle East and South Asia subcommittee.

"The representatives of this UN agency will argue that they cannot account for their employees' activities given the large number of Palestinians on their payrolls," Ros-Lehtinen told JTA. "If they are not exerting oversight over what is taking place in the institutions run by their agency, then the U.S. must exert strict oversight over its contributions to this agency."

UNRWA camps also have seen a slew of "workplace accidents," a euphemism for bombs that explode prematurely as terrorists prepare them.

"We talked to UNRWA about it, that if it happens, that's prima facie evidence the person was a terrorist," a State Department official told JTA. "But UNRWA's lawyer says, 'Well, not really. It's not a terrorist act simply to make a bomb.'

"We say that's really getting into the weeds legally," the official continued. "We don't know what other purposes they would be constructing a bomb for, and they fall into our definition for what ought to be excluded.

"UNRWA agreed in the end, and one reason they did, frankly, is we're the biggest donors and they don't want to get into a spat with us."

Israeli juniors earn IIHF silver medal

By LIONEL GAFFEN
Jerusalem Post

Israel's under-18 junior hockey team is moving up a division following a silver-medal performance at the International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) under-18 Division III world championships in Miercurea Ciuc, Romania.

Israel finished the five-team round-robin tournament with a 3-1-1 record. The host Romanians captured the gold with an unblemished 5-0 record. South Africa was third with a 2-1-2 record.

Israel bounced back to tie New Zealand 4-4 in its final game of the tournament after a 13-2 pummelling at the hands of the Romanians.

Both Israel and Romania will advance to Division II at next year's world championships.

"What a game!" said Alan Maislin, chair of the Israel Ice Hockey Federation, in Romania, just moments after the tie with New Zealand. "It was very, very exciting. The team displayed a great deal of mental toughness, particularly in the third period, when all the pressure was on them.

"After that loss to Romania – to a much better team... consisting of 17- and 18-year-olds – our team did very well considering the circumstances. Six of our players are 14 years old."

On Sunday, the last day of the tournament, Shon Norman scored Israel's first goal but the blue-and-white trailed 2-1 at the end of the opening period. Daniel Ehrlich, the tournament MVP, evened the score with a short-handed effort during the second. Oren Zamir tallied on a power play in the third and Ehrlich then staked Israel to a 4-3 lead.

New Zealand tied the game in the closing minutes with the third of its goals scored with a man advantage.

Eden Nemenoff, between the pipes for Israel, made 28 saves.

"Our goal for this tournament was to be promoted to Division II, and we accomplished our main goal. Six of our players are graduating this year, so it's a great send-off for them," Maislin said.

Israel reeled off three straight wins to start the tournament.

Led by Erlich, who finished as tournament scoring leader with 26 points (12 goals, 14 assists), the Israelis registered easy victories over Turkey (14-3) and Bulgaria (14-1), and a closer 8-5 win over South Africa. Erlich is a centre with the Toronto Marlies' bantam team.

In what shaped up as the gold-medal game, Israel faced the undefeated host team in game four, but was no match for the Romanians, who had been sent down from Division II the year before.

The tournament was initially scheduled to be played at Team Israel's home rink at Canada Center in Metulla, but the IIHF moved the event to Romania, citing security concerns. Metulla is on Israel's northern border with Lebanon and shooting incidents near the frontier town late last year prompted parents of players on other teams to pressure the IIHF to switch venues.

Israel's head coach, Jean Perron, a Stanley Cup-winning coach with the 1986 Montreal Canadiens, was optimistic going into the tournament.

"We're shooting for the gold," he said. "The team is in much better shape than last year, with more depth, and we have three full lines to count on and five defencemen, compared with last year when we could only really count on two lines and two of the defencemen. Eden Nemenoff will be in goal, and he's playing much better than last year; he's stronger and quicker, and it'll be a big challenge for him."

Jewish day school students play hooky to play hockey

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

More than 230 Jewish day school students took a day off school this month to compete in the 11th annual Yitzhak Rabin Memorial Hockey Tournament.

Fourteen teams from five Toronto Jewish days schools, all part of the Jewish Day School Hockey League (JDSHL), ended their season with the tourney, held March 10 at Chesswood Arena in North York.

"The kids love it," said Russell Pritchard, co-convener of the tournament and coach of United Synagogue Day School's Bayview campus Junior A team.

"For the most part, they don't love getting up at five in the morning to play... but they get rewarded by getting the day off school just to play hockey all day.

"The dynamic of having kids competing against kids they know – it's such an opportunity to see their buddies from another school," he added.

Participating schools included USDS, the Toronto Heschel School, Leo Baeck Day School, Associated Hebrew Schools and Bialik Hebrew Day School.

The teams, with players in grades 3 through 8, are divided into three divisions: Junior A, Junior B and Senior.

Centre Jake Pritchard of USDS Bayview

During the regular season, the juniors, in grades 3 to 5, play seven games and are ranked based on their record. The top four teams are placed in Junior A and the bottom four in Junior B.

The seniors, grades 6 to 8, play only five games in the regular season. There is a championship match for each division.

This year, Associated Kamin shut out USDS Bayview 7-0 in the Junior A final, Leo Baeck North defeated USDS Bathurst by a score of 5-2 in the Junior B final, and the USDS Bathurst Senior team beat Associated by the same score to take the championship.

Jake Pritchard, a 10-year-old centre on the USDS Bayview Junior A team, said he loves being part of the JDSHL.

"It's fun to play against kids that are also juniors," he said just before he took to the ice to face the Associated Posluns team in the semi-final. "I like to play with people from my school that I know and it's fun to try your hardest and score some goals."

Pritchard's teammate Corbin Greenwald, 11, has been playing in the JDSHL for three years.

"I like playing with my friends and hanging out in the dressing room and having fun," he said.

Time to look in the mirror

Sandie Benitah
20 Something

Isn't it sad that in 2006, in the most multicultural city in the world, to read about the despicable amount of ignorance that's documented in the Toronto police's annual report on hate crimes.

What's worse is that the Jewish and black communities continue to be at the top of the list of the most hated, with 33 hate crimes committed against each group in 2005.

But before I cast blame on the people who decided to scar our community last year, I'm going to take a closer look at myself.

How many times should I have been reported for a hate crime? Maybe I shouldn't have laughed so hard at a comedian's racist jokes the last time I went to a comedy club. Maybe I shouldn't have yelled "No wonder!" to the member of a visible minority who cut me off on the road the other day. Maybe I shouldn't make comments about my own religion, no matter how jokingly, just because I know I can get away with it while a stranger can't.

No one reported me to the police, but here is my confession. I'm just as guilty as anyone else for laughing, for thinking and for saying anything that puts down someone else just because of his or her background, religion or race.

It's not enough for us to write articles condemning cowardly hate crimes, or for us to give sound bites to the media on how saddened we are about recent statistics. We need to look inside and re-evaluate what we define as acceptable behaviour, because once we do, we'll realize the line of distinction between us and them is very thin.

The problem is that it's tough to draw a line dividing what is acceptable and what isn't. Should comedians be charged with hate crimes for telling racially charged jokes? And what about the media and free speech? Without it, we wouldn't have a true democracy, but with it, we're also somewhat responsible for sending the message that it's OK to act in a hurtful way to others.

For example, people will argue about the differences between spray-painting swastikas on walls and giving a speech in a lecture hall questioning the existence of the Holocaust. One is a senseless act of vandalism that promotes hatred but shows no backbone. The other is an "intellectual" debate held in a public forum supported by the backbone of democracy – free speech. But to any Jewish person, either occurrence feels like a slap in the face.

It's tough for journalists to debate the merits of free speech, but how can we tolerate and accept any kind of hatred, even if it's in an academic context?

Limiting ourselves in what we read or what we say is not the answer. Rather, the answer should be about how we think and how we articulate our ideas. Our articulateness and thoughtfulness are what freedom of speech is all about.

Freedom of speech is also about critical thinking, and when it's masked by blatant ignorance and stupidity, it's hard to see how much harm we're doing to ourselves and the communities we live in.

To commit a hate crime is to commit a great injustice toward a person and toward a community. When we laugh at offensive jokes or say offensive things in the heat of the moment, we might not be held criminally liable, but we are always liable to ourselves. We become the bullies of the schoolyard who instead of helping our peers, laugh when they are down.

We may not be the ones responsible for hate crimes, but we are always responsible for the unsolicited hatred that comes out of our mouths.

EGGPLANT LASAGNA FOR PASSOVER

1 Jar Passover tomato sauce
1 eggplant, cut into small chunks
8 garlic cloves
2 onions
5 mushrooms
8 oz. grated mozzarella cheese
1/2 c grated parmesan cheese
1/4 tsp. each oregano, powdered garlic, hot pepper flakes, rosemary (dried)
5 pieces plain matzah

Saute eggplant in oil until it reduces to a mushy consistency. Set aside in bowl. Chop onions, mushrooms and garlic; sauté in pan; sprinkle a little of the spices over mixture; mix in eggplant. Spray a small rectangular baking dish with cooking oil. Pour some sauce into the dish and lay down matzah to fit. Spread with sauteed veggies; sprinkle on more spices, some parmesan cheese and more sauce. Continue until you use up your ingredients, ending with cheese on top. Bake at 350°F for about 35-40 min.

Dear Ella,

Last month I lost my mother to cancer. It was a very difficult time, and still is.

My father died more than six years ago, so my mother was my only parent for a while. When she died, one of the first things I thought was that I am an orphan now. I know that sounds silly after all, I'm 47 years old. Who ever heard of a 47-year-old woman referring to themselves as an orphan, a term I've always associated with children.

About Life

Nevertheless, I can't help feeling very alone, especially with Passover just around the corner. I have a husband and three children, but I still feel alone, abandoned and even a little scared.

Do you think I've lost it altogether? I haven't spoken to anyone about feeling this way, I'm too embarrassed.

Mid-Life Orphan

Dear Mid-Life Orphan

We all accept the fact that our parents will eventually die. It's part of life, and logically we know the script, but the reality of a parent's death comes with far more emotion attached to it than we anticipate.

You need to understand that your feelings are normal. You have not, as you put it, "lost it." I think if you did open up to people about how you are feeling, you would be very surprised to hear that others have felt that way too, myself included.

For a while, you will think things like, "I have to go call mom," or, "Wait till I tell mom this story." Those are sad moments, but because they had been part of your routine your entire life, they're to be expected.

Passover and major holidays will be difficult, especially in the first year. However, you can bring your memories to the seder with you by possibly preparing your mother's favourite dishes, discussing what Bubbie or Zaide would have said or done now. Don't repress your feelings. Embrace them, and let others help you live through them.

You are lucky to have a husband and three children to help get you through these rough times. Eventually, your grief will change to memories that you will hold deep in your heart forever.

Take peace seriously

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Over the last 60 years, a disproportionate number of hostile United Nations resolutions have been aimed at Israel. Blood-curdling terrorist attacks and acts of violence have been perpetrated against Jews in Israel, France and dozens of other countries. Clearly, there is cause for us to be on high alert for anti-Semitism and anti-Israel activities. To think otherwise would be naive.

On the other hand, it is equally important to be aware of the considerable number of organizations sprouting up to bring together Jews and Arabs to achieve peaceful coexistence. To close one's eyes to this phenomenon would be tragic.

To learn more about such movements, simply Google "Jews, Arabs and Peace." You'll discover dozens of groups. Among them are the Interfaith Encounter Association, dedicated to promoting peace in the Middle East through interfaith dialogue and cross-cultural study; the Interreligious Coordinationg Council in Israel, an umbrella organization of more than 70 Jewish, Muslim and Christian institutions actively working toward inter-religious and inter-cultural understanding in Israel and the region; the Givat Haviva Educational Institute; and the Israel-Palestinian Bereaved Families for Peace founded by Israeli businessman Yitzhak Frankenthal, whose son was killed by Palestinians. Members are Palestinians and Israelis who have lost loved ones in the conflict and who work together to end the strife between Israelis and Palestinians through mutual understanding.

Another venture with a similar mission statement is Neve Shalom/Wahat al-Salam. It was founded in 1978 by one Arab and four Jews and is a unique community located on a rock-strewn crest midway between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. The community was created to determine if Jews and Palestinian Arabs could learn to understand and respect each other's faith and culture while preserving their own.

Neve Shalom is now home to 20 Jewish and 20 Arab families. They work together in the village's guest house, offices and schools. The children attend classes taught alternately by an Arab instructor one week and a Jewish instructor the next. Students plan activities for Islamic and Jewish holidays, and learn about the region's complex history from Israeli and Palestinian viewpoints.

There are many hateful Hamans in our world whose names should be drowned out through the spinning of the gragger. However, there are also countless courageous Jews, Arabs and Muslim focusing on the biblical imperative: speak you every man truth to his neighbour; execute the judgment of truth and peace in your gates.

I think it is time we seriously recognize ways and means of peacefully arming ourselves in the battle against hatred and stereotypes. Former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir did so when she established Mashav in 1958, an arm of the Israeli Foreign Ministry, whose aim was/is to share the know-how and technologies that provided the basis for Israel's own rapid development with the developing world (which includes many countries with large Muslim populations and anti-Israel policies). Meir knew it would be years before peace was secured politically, and therefore made sure to pursue it at a grassroots level.

Like Golda, I believe we must find those Arabs/Muslims who would leap at the chance to stop wars and destruction, and instead live a life of peace side by side with their Israeli/Jewish counterparts. I therefore encourage philanthropists, world leaders and Jewish and Arab community members to build upon this possibility by creating a long-term and comprehensive plan to achieve peace and coexistence in the Middle East.

We should prepare well in the defence of our people. This strategy must, however, embrace every means possible to realize peace, including the support and participation of existing movements that have already mobilized hopeful forces with the conviction that we are all creations of God and therefore share in his tranquility. Take peace seriously!

'Israel's saddest elections'

No party promised peace

By YOSSI KLEIN HALEVI

The most boring elections ever, proclaim the political commentators. And it's hard to argue with them. After all, few party banners compete at intersections, few political bumper stickers appear on cars, and the ratings are down for the campaign ads that used to provide nightly entertainment in our raucous election season.

The reason for the lack of passion, though, isn't voter apathy, as commentators insist, but despair. These are Israel's saddest elections, the first with barely a mention of peace. In the past, even right-wing candidates had to hold out the promise that a hard line would bring a more trustworthy peace than the left's concessions, that "peace for generations," as one right-wing slogan went, would be more durable than peace now. Few really believed in 1996 that Benjamin Netanyahu would manage "a secure peace," or that "only Sharon will bring peace," as the 2001 Likud slogan put it. But failure to pay lip service to peace meant damning yourself as an unelectable fanatic.

Analysis

Now, though, with the rise of Hamas, not even the candidates of the left are promising peace. Both the hard-left Meretz and the centre-left Labor party are focusing instead on domestic issues. Labor leader Amir Peretz has suggested strengthening Palestian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, but mostly Peretz has emphasized social issues and the "fight against terror." There's a limit, after all, even to Peretz's amateurish politics: most voters realize that if Abbas was irrelevant before the rise of the Hamas, he is hardly more relevant now.

This election isn't only the burial ground of the peace process but of Greater Israel. Only one right-wing party, the National Union-National Religious Party (in fact a coalition of two parties), continues to unequivocally support the settlement movement. The Likud's opposition to unilateral withdrawal from the West Bank isn't over withdrawal but unilateralism. Indeed, during the Gaza withdrawal, Likud leader Netanyahu noted that he, too, wants to see Israel out of Gaza. The only question is whether Israel should reward terrorism and offer the Palestinians

Ya'alon: Gaza pullout a strategic mistake

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In his olive green pullover and casual pants, with his wire rim spectacles and jowly features, Moshe (Bogie) Ya'alon hardly has the appearance of a warrior, let alone a former chief of staff of the Israel Defence Forces (IDF).

Yet, when he talks about the withdrawal from Gaza or the dangers posed by a nuclear-armed Iran, the former lieutenant-general and IDF chief of staff (2002-05) shows his steel.

The August 2005 withdrawal from Gaza was a bad strategic mistake, Ya'alon stated in an interview with The CJN. Not only did it violate years of Israeli doctrine – trading land for peace – it also strengthened Hamas (they could rightly claim terrorism paid), and it led to the terrorist organization's political victory in the January Gaza elections.

Moshe Ya'alon

Ya'alon, a controversial figure in Israeli public life who clashed with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon over the Gaza withdrawal, was in Toronto last week to address a program sponsored by Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, Beit Halochem Canada at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Beit Halochem Canada is a humanitarian fundraising agency established in 1984 that provides assistance to disabled veterans of Israel. Over the years, Canadians have contributed millions to provide medical and rehabilitation equipment for Beit Halochem centres in Israel, and every year, the Toronto and Montreal Jewish communities each host a two-week visit for groups of Israeli disabled war veterans.

Teaching Tolerance

WINNIPEG — A new school program in Winnipeg is bringing together Jewish and aboriginal high-school students. Grade 11 students at Gray Academy of Jewish Education and Southeast College meet to discuss religious and cultural traditions, the CBC reported. A teacher at the aboriginal school started the program last year after two of her students made anti-Semitic comments.

Golan Duty Ends

TORONTO — Canada ended its 32-year participation in the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF) on the Golan Heights March 24, and the Canada-Israel Committee thanked successive governments for backing the mission. "While the CIC would like Canada to continue its participation in UNDOF, we appreciate the fact [the Canadian] Forces are required in Afghanistan, where Canada is seeking to bring peace and stability," the CIC said.

CJC Fights Web Hate

TORONTO — To mark the International Day for the Elimination of Racial Discrimination, Canadian Jewish Congress launched an initiative last week to fight Web hate. "Stop Internet Hate" features a link on CJC's website, cjc.ca, for reporting hate sites. "We will assess the information, and if we believe it violates either Canada's Criminal Code or the Canadian Human Rights Act, it will be reported," said Len Rudner, CJC's director of community relations.

Jewish Tourists Killed

SANTIAGO — Twelve U.S. tourists on a B'nai B'rith trip were killed in a bus accident in northern Chile last week. They were returning to their Celebrity Cruises ship after visiting Lauca National Park on March 22 when their bus swerved off a highway and plunged 300 feet down a mountainside. The 14-night South American cruise left from Fort Lauderdale, Fla. Two surviving Americans were in stable condition last week.

Canadian Jews Help

NEW ORLEANS — Some 28 students and staff from Hillels in Toronto, Montreal and Kingston were in New Orleans for spring break to help build homes for a week with Habitat for Humanity. They were hosted by Hillel Foundation of New Orleans. While there, they toured areas devastated last August by Hurricane Katrina. They also met local Hillel students and took part in the city's first post-Katrina Mardi Gras. It was the second group of Canadian students to help out after Katrina: Hillel of Greater Toronto sent 19 students to Gulfport, Miss., on the winter break.

Proposal for Dialogue

SEVILLE — Yona Metzger, Israel's chief Ashkenazi rabbi, called for a "United Nations of religious groups" as the second World Congress of Imams and Rabbis for Peace opened last week in Seville, Spain, BBC reported. Also at the three-day meeting, Rabbi Israel Singer of the World Jewish Congress rejected the idea that Jewish-Muslim tensions lie at the root of the Mideast conflict. He added in a speech that "religious crusaders" such as Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, "must be exposed for what they are: Impostors." Some 150 rabbis and imams took part in the conference.

Test Flawed: Study

WASHINGTON — A genetic test for breast-cancer mutations linked to Ashkenazi Jews misses the mutations 12 per cent of the time, a new study says. The test searches for the BRCA-1 and BRCA-2 mutations, which are carried by two per cent of Ashkenazi Jews and are linked to breast and ovarian cancers, according to the Human Genome Project in Washington. The test in current use has a patent that stops other tests from being developed. The researchers said it prevents the use of other tests that could catch more mutations.

Torahs Buried

NEW ORLEANS — Some 200 people attended a ceremony near New Orleans last week to bury seven Torahs destroyed in floods from Hurricane Katrina. The scrolls were from Beth Israel, a 102-year-old shul, the New Orleans Times-Picayune reported.

Archive Goes Online

LONDON — The London Jewish Chronicle has digitized its catalogue of articles dating back to 1841. The articles are accessible for a fee at www.thejc.com. The archive "will provide a unique resource for exploring world Jewish history," the paper said.

Groups Urge Greater Access to Kids' Book

TORONTO — Ontario school boards that have restricted access to Three Wishes: Palestinian and Israeli Children Speak, a controversial children's book by anti-war author Deborah Ellis, are being urged by members of Toronto's literary community to reconsider their positions.

Deborah Ellis

PEN Canada, the Writer's Guild of Canada and Groundwood Books, the book's publisher, as well as authors, librarians and parents, held a news conference in Toronto last week and asked the boards to allow children in grades 4 to 6 read the book as part of the Ontario Library Association's Silver Birch recreational reading program.

The Toronto and York Region public school boards have restricted the book to children in older grades, and they said they won't change that policy. Boards in Niagara, Ottawa and Essex have also limited access to it, although last week, two London-area boards said it will remain on library shelves.

The York board pulled Three Wishes from the Silver Birch program after a teacher raised concerns about its age appropriateness. Canadian Jewish Congress later wrote to all Ontario boards asking that it be restricted to children in older grades, because CJC says it demonizes the Israeli army and suggests suicide bombing is a legitimate recourse for Palestinian youths. Spokesperson Len Rudner said CJC was not advocating censorship, but was asking the boards to consider whether the book is appropriate for its target audience.

Three Wishes consists of interviews with children who discuss their lives and name three things they'd wish for. Ellis provides a historical introduction before each child's story.

Anti-Semitic incidents down slightly in 2005

Significant problems found on campuses and Internet

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The number of anti-Semitic incidents in Canada declined marginally in 2005, but campuses remain uncomfortable places for Jewish students and left- and right-wing extremists continue to employ the Internet to spread anti-Semitic images and rhetoric, B'nai Brith Canada reported last week in its annual Audit of Antisemitic Incidents.

The audit noted that the level of anti-Semitism remains at historically high levels after three years of growth between 2002 and 2004.

Altogether, 829 incidents were reported in 2005, down from 857 cases the year before.

The 857 events in 2004 were the highest number recorded since the human rights organization began publishing its audit 22 years ago. In the past 10 years, the number of incidents reached a low of 212 in 1997, but the number shot up in the next year to 459 and continued an upward trend in 2003 with 584, and even more in 2004, as stated above.

"As the data illustrates, the baseline for anti-Semitic incidents seems to have permanently shifted from the levels commonly seen in the 1990s, with an overall trend towards rising numbers," the audit states. "The persistence of this phenomenon indicates that overt anti-Semitism has become a permanent feature in Canadian society. This suggests that less obvious manifestations of prejudice are indeed interwoven into the multicultural mosaic of this country."

Looking at the data on a regional basis, the audit found that 544 incidents (65.6 per cent) took place in Ontario, where 196,000 Jews reside. That marked a 2.6 per cent growth in cases over 2004. Incidents of vandalism dropped, but harassment shot up nearly 30 per cent.

Of the incidents reported in Ontario, 418 took place in the Greater Toronto Area. "This is the highest number ever recorded for any city in the history of the audit," the report states.

B'nai Brith estimates that only about 10 per cent of all incidents are reported.

The audit suggested the increasing use of the Internet to promote hate is a growing cause for concern – along with the reluctance of criminal justice agencies to charge purveyors of Internet hate.

"The huge explosion of hate on the Internet influenced the nature of many of the incidents for 2005, with both the far right and the far left borrowing from each other's images and rhetoric," the audit states. "This propaganda is influencing how Jews are viewed in society, as seen in incidents in every sector of Canadian life.

"The criminal justice system appears to have abdicated responsibility for Internet hate to the human rights sector. It has also shown a more inconsistent and lenient response to hate activity, giving the impression that anti-Jewish messaging will be tolerated."

The audit noted that 161 reports of Web-based hate activity were registered in 2005, compared to 47 the year before.

The audit also reported that Jewish students feel intimidated and unwelcome in Canadian universities.

"Jewish students – often visible Jews – were targeted in 48 reported anti-Semitic incidents on campus, similar to levels in 2003 and 2004," the report states. "Inflammatory anti-Israel campaigns continue to be mounted with events that demonize the Jewish state, delegitimize its existence and often endorse violence and terrorism against its citizens. In addition to these incidents, classrooms have become less than welcoming to Jewish students who do not publicly follow the prevailing anti-Israel tone… This type of antagonistic atmosphere has often led to anti-Jewish outbursts."

Voter considerations

From the editor's desk

The eccentricities of our production schedule occasionally bring about major gaps in our news coverage. This week is one such occasion.

The Israeli general elections were held on Tuesday. The CJN went to press on Monday. Thus readers will receive their copies of the paper one or two days after the elections. Yet, there will be no news of the election results in the newspaper.

We will try to compensate for the election lacuna in this issue with heightened coverage in the next issue.

In Israel, especially, election predictions are a bit of a mug's game. Respondents are notoriously unreliable and fickle in responding to telephone polls. But more important, in so small a country, political outcomes are quickly influenced by and closely tied to the behaviour of the Palestinians.

As of this writing, 48 hours before the election, the centrist party Kadima was leading its major left-of-centre and right-of-centre rivals, Labor and Likud, respectively. At least a third of the voters, however, said they were undecided.

The most significant pre-election news was the alleged extent of election indifference by 21- to 28-year-olds, some 60 per cent of whom purportedly claimed they would not vote at all.

Only the final tallies will tell how, or if, pre-election predictions matched post-election results.

But however many Israelis actually did vote, they did so knowing the following pieces of information that were published on the weekend.

According to a poll conducted by the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the Palestinian Center for Policy and Survey Research in Ramallah, nearly 60 per cent of Palestinians oppose recognition of the State of Israel by Hamas at this time. In contrast, some 37 per cent would support Hamas recognizing Israel.

The poll was conducted earlier this month among 1270 Palestinians and 603 Israelis and has a margin of error of three per cent and four per cent respectively.

Those 60 per cent of Palestinians need not worry. Hamas will not let them down by conceding that the Jews, too, have a right to a state of their own in the Middle East. Indeed, Hamas is not yet ready to renounce terrorism.

In fact, it has proudly announced its intention to institutionalize it.

According to a Reuters report last week, Hamas' candidate for interior minister, Saeed Seyam, said that "talks with the [Palestinian] factions in the future will focus on the mechanisms, the shape and the timing" of attacks [on Israel]. Seyam, who will be in charge of the main security services, made certain that the Israel and the West understood that he will not arrest any terrorists. "The day will never come," Seyam proclaimed, "when any Palestinian would be arrested because of his political affiliation or because of resisting the occupation."

There should be no illusions in the West about Hamas or any soft-pedaling of its program. Hamas is intent and immovably focused on one objective: to replace the Jewish state with their uniquely Islamic one. It is a religious mission. It is not a dispute over territory; rather, it is a dispute over theology.

There should be no demands or expectations upon Israel that it sit down with Hamas to negotiate a "settlement" of the conflict. No individual, nor any state, should be compelled to compromise away its own life and its own existence. Israel will be equally immovably focused in defence of the lives of its citizens and its own sovereign existence.

The West should speak with one voice, unbudging from the three a-priori commitments that it has demanded from Hamas:

- recognition of Israel;
- renunciation of violence; and
- acceptance of existing Palestinian Authority-signed agreements with Israel.

Thus we should extend not even the tiniest shred of credibility in a so-called "conciliatory message to Israeli voters" by Palestinian prime minister-designate Ismail Haniyeh as reported on the weekend by the Jerusalem Post.

"We don't want a whirlpool of blood in this region," Haniyeh told reporters in Gaza City. "We want the rights and dignity of our people. We also want to put an end to this complicated conflict that has been going on for decades."

Could it be that the Hamas leader has suddenly rejected violence and embraced statecraft? Not likely.

The real voice of Hamas is the familiar one of foreign minister-designate Mahmoud Zahar. Even as his prime minister spoke to reporters in Gaza, Zahar was setting the record straight: Hamas would not "give up one inch of Palestine," he said.

Invoking the name and memory of former Hamas leader and founder Ahmed Yassin, who was executed by the Israelis, Zahar said, "Even if the U.S. gave us all its money in return for recognizing Israel and giving up one inch of Palestine, we would never do so, even if this costs us our lives. Our right to pursue the resistance will remain as long as the occupation continues over our lands and holy sites."

Palestinians voted two months ago.

Israelis voted this week.

Now the two sides are drawn. Where will they lead?

'Islamic states are a threat to the western world' heard Ya'alon speak in Toronto. About 50 demonstrators marched quietly outside the synagogue to protest his appearance. Al Awda, a Palestinian organization, called on supporters to protest against Ya'alon, calling him a war criminal.

News reports in Israel last week suggested that a small number of pro-Palestinian groups and at least one unnamed Jewish group had asked Canadian authorities to bar Ya'alon from entering Canada, or to detain and charge him with war crimes once he arrived, but the charges never materialized.

Ya'alon dismissed the allegations against him as "propaganda."

He said Israel's unilateral withdrawal will not put an end to demands on the Jewish state or provide the disengagement promised by Sharon. In fact, calls for safe passage between Gaza and the West Bank are already being made, as well as demands that Israel export Palestinian produce.

"We're supposed to let Palestinian strawberries go to Ben-Gurion [airport], and they launch Qassams [missiles]. Unbelievable," he said.

"This is not disengagement," he continued. Ya'alon predicted that following Israel's March 28 election, "we will hear from the international community for more concessions in the West Bank."

By requiring nothing of the Palestinians, Israel relinquished its demand that the Palestinians comply with the Oslo requirement to demobilize militia organizations. Israel also gave up control over Gaza's borders, which it was entitled to maintain under Oslo. And the open border with Egypt is being used to import dangerous military hardware, he said.

Most important, Ya'alon said, "we strengthened the Palestinian narrative. They say the problem is the occupation and the settlements are illegitimate. We should say we have a right to live anywhere in the land of Israel, but for peace, we would give it up."

Ya'alon's disapproval of the Gaza withdrawal is widely believed to have led to his premature departure as chief of staff. Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz told Israeli reporters he and Ya'alon did not see eye to eye on strategic issues, and Ya'alon's successor, Dan Halutz, pointedly stated that "we must not drag the IDF into the public debate that accompanies the disengagement plan."

Ya'alon's three-year term as chief of staff was not renewed, contrary to the general practice in Israel. He is now a research fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

"I did not speak out publicly [about] my opinions," Ya'alon told The CJN, adding that information about his views on disengagement were leaked.

He was scathing about Sharon's decision to order the Gaza withdrawal, saying, "As far as I know, it wasn't a strategic decision. It was a political decision.

"It was based in part on fear that someone else would come out with a new political initiative in the summer of 2003."

He noted that independent Israeli-Palestinian peace initiatives were being discussed then, while the European Union and the United States were suspected of preparing initiatives that were not in Israel's interests.

In addition, he said, Sharon faced accusations of corruption and was concerned by the drop in his popularity.

Sharon devised the Gaza withdrawal without consulting with the IDF. "It came out in talks with his strategic advisors" whose focus was on the "media, spin and public relations," Ya'alon contended.

"No doubt I spoke out my views. I had to do it, to express my professional analysis. I believe I became an obstacle to this issue to his close circle."

Asked why the pullout remains popular with the Israeli public, Ya'alon compared the atmosphere in Israel to pre-World War II Europe – "people prefer short-run hope."

Elite opinion makers in Israel, consisting of "rich people and the media," pushed for the withdrawal. "There was no real public discourse to deal with the repercussions" of a pullout, he said, adding opinion-makers "go on deceiving the public."

Turning to Iran, Ya'alon stressed that the Islamic states are "not just a threat to Israel, [but] a threat to the western world. It's a generator of terrorism in the region."

Iran finances and supports Palestinian terrorist organizations like Islamic Jihad and Fatah, it is "behind the insurgency in Iraq" and it supports Hezbollah in Lebanon.

Ya'alon said historic precedent suggests the main danger from a nuclear-armed Iran would be its support for proxies who might be given a "dirty" (radioactive) weapon to employ against a western target.

Nevertheless, Iran might use a nuke itself. It has acquired medium range missiles and is seeking to expand the range of its missiles, perhaps to as much as 10,000 kilometres.

"It's an unconventional regime, not like the Soviet Union," he said. Part of its ideology is the desire to hasten the arrival of a hidden imam. To encourage that, it needs to defeat the West and destroy Israel, he said.

Israel, the United States and NATO all possess military options against the Iranian nuclear program, but he warned, "Israel should not be in the spearhead."

Iran must first be politically and economically isolated, with a military option employed as a last resort. "In one way or another, the Iranian nuclear threat must be stopped. Otherwise, it will affect the global strategic balance," he said.

Iraqi congregation celebrates 30 years in Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

This past Sunday, Mar. 26, the Iraqi Jewish Association of Ontario held a black-tie gala with more than 300 people at the Sephardic Kehila Centre to celebrate the 30th anniversary of its congregation and honour a dozen founding members.

For the past two years, the association has been holding services in a chapel at the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill. Until 1999, when they moved to the synagogue, they met for High Holy Day services and holiday celebrations but not Shabbat services.

In the past few years the congregation – which according to organizers is the only one in North America using original Baghdadi tunes exclusively – has grown from about 25 people at a typical Shabbat service to between 60 and 80 worshippers every week. Sometimes there are as many as 100 or 120, according to president Reuven Aharon, a 48-year-old Sabra born to an Iraqi family, who has been in Canada for 21 years.

He found the congregation only five years ago, and instantly felt "this was my home," he said in a joint interview several months ago. "It was the tunes that they sang, and the whole atmosphere."

The traditional prayer services are followed by a kiddush with Iraqi food.

Eliahou Sasson, a retired pharmacist, served for many years as the congregation's treasurer and one of the lay leaders – the go-to person for "inspiration" and answers to members' questions, said Aharon.

Like many Iraqi Jews, Sasson left the country following a 1951 pogrom. "The Jews left to escape persecution," he said. He spent the next 18 years in Israel before immigrating to Canada.

But his memories of Baghdad are not all bad. "I went to public schools and I had friends who were Muslims... I'm sorry for what's happening there. The people themselves are not bad. We worked with them. They were good people, nice people."

Until 1933, Jews had "an excellent life" in Iraq, said Naim Dallal, an octogenarian retired dentist who studied in Syria and Lebanon because of quotas at Iraqi universities. "There [had been] no persecution. We were in the government, in colleges. It started to change when Hitler came to power.

"After the establishment of Israel we couldn't go to school, we couldn't work." There were hangings of Jews and confiscation of property, he recalled.

"It was unbearable," said his wife, Renée, who came to Canada with him in 1953.

Government persecution of the few Jews who remained in Iraq – as well as similar issues in other Arab countries – prompted the fledgling group to take a political lobbying role in the early 1970s.

On a more upbeat note, Toronto's Iraqi Jews – and a few non-Iraqis who just enjoy the group and the services – celebrate Jewish holidays together and have yearly themed galas featuring dinner and dancing.

For 26 years, during the winter months, Renée – Aharon's predecessor as president organized monthly lectures on topics ranging from health to politics. She also wrote the group's newletter, "a lovely, warm letter to our members," she said.

Sasson credits her for the organization's growth. It is not uncommon to see three generations at High Holy Day services, "which just makes our hearts sing," Renée said.

They stood tall, on guard for peace

The Yom Kippur War was a bloody, at times fevered, fight for family, country and survival. When Syrian tanks made their initial advance downward from the Golan Heights towards the heartland of Israel, very few Israeli forces blocked their way. Those few soldiers however, fought heroically, and with great sacrifice, until reinforcements arrived to stem, and ultimately reverse, the terrible tide of the first days of the war.

Today, nearly 33 years after the war ended, some of the charred and cindered remains of the horrible tank battles are still strewn across the Golan, the volcanic crust of igneous rock that rises high above the Hula Valley and that many Israelis call "the eyes of the state."

Fighting ended on Oct. 22, 1973, but it was not until some months later, in 1974, that the contending forces actually disengaged. The United Nations established a peacekeeping force, the United Nations Disengagement Observer Force (UNDOF), to ensure that the hostile armies remained separated and to act as a buffer between Syria and Israel. Canadian troops were there from the beginning. Along with contingents from Austria, Poland and Peru, they formed the UNDOF and have remained on the Golan ever since. Until last week.

On March 24, Canada ended its participation in UNDOF. Most of the 189-soldier contingent is coming home this week. Some 20 officers will stay on a bit longer, and two officers will remain into the summer. Over the years, some 12,000 Canadians have been part of UNDOF. They have served with distinction and integrity, having earned the trust and appreciation of both sides.

And Canadians, too, lost their lives on the Golan. On Aug. 9, 1974, at the very outset of the mission, nine Canadians were aboard a routine troop transport flight from Ismailia to Damascus that was shot down by a Syrian surface-to-air missile. All were killed.

But peacekeeping today is different than it was three decades ago. Instead of standing between opposing, uniformed armies, our soldiers are needed to stand between a vulnerable civilian population and the brutal terrorist forces seeking to impose totalitarian rule by all and any means. Thus, much of the expertise and skill Canadians have acquired through UNDOF and other such peacekeeping missions will now be put to use in Afghanistan.

We echo the words of gratitude and appreciation that were expressed last week by the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) for the decisions of successive Canadian governments that authorized the continued Canadian presence on the Golan. And, as the CIC did, we too, "salute the men and women of the Canadian Forces who have served Canada honourably on this peacekeeping mission in the Middle East."

Canada's role in UNDOF has been a manifestly magnificent demonstration of Canadian values at their best, of standing resolutely on guard, tall and defiant, on behalf of peace and a better world for all peoples.

Olmert's wishful thinking

The prediction by acting Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert that Israel will have permanent borders four years from now reminds me of a pronouncement made by his mentor, then defence minister Ariel Sharon, during the Lebanon war in 1982 ("Olmert pledges final borders by 2010," CJN, March 16.).

At that time, Sharon triumphantly declared that Israel will "very shortly" conclude a peace treaty with Lebanon, then led by a Christian president, Bashir Gemayel. A few days after he made that statement, Gemayel was assassinated and, unfortunately, 24 years later Israel is still officially at war with Lebanon. Wishful thinking is no substitute for reality, especially in the Middle East.

Reply to 'Concerned Jewish Canadians'

How enlightening that a group of Canadian Jews takes exception to Israel pursuing "a primary military strategy" ("Group opposes Israeli government policies," letters, CJN, March 9). This group states that their lives have been "adversely affected by the policies of various governments of Israel." Not only do I feel sorry for their hardships, but I pity them. They are proud to be another of many Jewish groups to stand up today and challenge the government of Israel for not following the "vision" of Oslo and a myriad of other self-serving issues, while I am still waiting for just one Arab group, inside the Arab countries or in Canada or elsewhere, to stand up and challenge the humanity of killing and blowing up Jews worldwide. Not just today, but before 1967, or for that matter even before 1948. Do they really believe that if today there were any other solution except military it would not have been tried? Do they not believe that Jews will do anything they can to prevent violence. Are they so self-loathing that they protest because their Canadian lives have been "adversely affected" by people seeing them as Jews?

Students 'disengaged' from communal life

The Roundtable articles put little emphasis on one very important point: Susannah Dainow's comment that the community needs to find out why students are "disengaged" from communal life ("'Being Jewish is a pretty big thing,' CJN, March 23).

This is, in my opinion, the most critical step in understanding how to re-engage such students in the Jewish community. Yet, surprisingly, no one has bothered to ask disengaged students why they feel so detached from Judaism and what types of programs would make them more involved.

By posing such an obvious question, Hillel and the Jewish community at large would get a glimpse into who these mysterious "disengaged" students are and would then be able to serve the large majority of "disengaged" students in a truly informed manner.

Rabbis opposed to Bill 61

The Toronto Board of Rabbis views with dismay a private member's bill, Bill 61, that was recently proposed in Ontario's legislature. The bill states that "upon the death of a person, tissue from the person's body may be removed… without the consent of the person from whom the tissue is removed." It is only a formal objection that would prohibit the removal of tissue and organs.

The Toronto Board of Rabbis is concerned with these conditions and the purposes to which the tissue would be put because neither is clear. In the Jewish religion, human organs and tissues may be removed and transplanted, but the person would have to be clearly dead and not be a living farm to harvest organs. Judaism is in favour of tissue transplant, but not under all conditions and not for all purposes. One would have to be much more specific about the meaning of "medical education" or "research." We must remember that the Body-worlds exhibit of plasticized human cadavers at the Ontario Science Centre was called "education," but that this exhibit was opposed by rabbis of all Jewish branches and the Toronto Board of Rabbis as being far more for entertainment and commercial purposes than for science.

The sanctity of human life is our greatest concern. Taking away from the individual the right to determine a positive consent to tissue removal opens the door to many abuses. In addition, a person should not be presented with the choice of affirming or denying consent with nothing in between. For these reasons, the Toronto Board of Rabbis is opposed to Bill 61.

How we give mirrors who we are

Big donors must give more tzedakah

By MICHAEL STEINHARDT
Jerusalem Post

I have a dream in which Jewish early childhood educators in the United States, who presently receive an average salary of $9.66 per hour, can raise their own children without having to take out loans or marry rich. I have a dream in which birthright israel does not have to keep tens of thousands of potential participants on waiting lists for lack of funds. I have a dream in which non-Orthodox day schools truly rival the best private schools and the Jewish socioeconomic elite clamour to enter them.

Michael Steinhardt

While these dreams are, alas, remote and quixotic, American Jews have achieved levels of wealth unprecedented in our history. The problem is that we no longer give much to Jewish causes.

We are donors to universities, museums, orchestras and hospitals, but when it comes to Jewish philanthropy, we fall short. Today, perhaps 20 per cent or less of Jewish giving goes to Jewish causes.

In the middle of the 20th century, it was about 50 per cent. Only half of the Jews surveyed in 1990 claimed to have given to a Jewish cause. Of the $5.3 billion in megagifts given by America's wealthiest Jews between 1995 and 2000, a mere six per cent went to Jewish institutions.

Among those who do give, the levels of giving are weak. Only 11 per cent of Jews donate more than $1,000 to Jewish causes.

Can you name a serious non-Orthodox American Jewish philanthropist below the age of 50?

There may be one or two, but it would be looking for a needle in a haystack. Even those who give Jewishly give smaller amounts to Jewish charity than to secular causes. Too many ignore programs of Jewish education and culture, focusing instead on antiquated preoccupations such as the fight against anti-Semitism. In North America, the greatest threat to the Jewish people is not the external force of anti-Semitism, but the internal forces of apathy, inertia and ignorance of our own heritage.

People's giving is a mirror image of who they are. Over time, we have become meaningfully more American and less Jewish. That is reflected in our philanthropy. We have lost not only our connection to Jewish roots, but also our understanding of why Jewish identity and involvement matter. It's an unfortunate cycle: attenuation of identity leads to reduced philanthropic giving, which, in turn, hobbles our efforts to create programs to enrich identity.

How, then, does one revive Jewishness in an increasingly secular American world? It's not easy. Too many of our needs are no longer fulfilled Jewishly. Today's synagogues and other institutions no longer appeal to the Jewish spirit the way they used to. Tzedakah is an outcome, an end-product of what we care about, what we want to enhance, what we believe in, and what we want to see grow. If we were to apply these hopes to our present community, I'm not sure we would like what we see.

The community has not operated by a set of norms and standards of what constitutes appropriate tzedakah. People who have amassed enormous wealth are told by "professionals" that they're the most altruistic individuals since Robin Hood, regardless of what they give. There are few role models in the community who represent our tradition of giving 10 per cent of income or assets.

Historically, the rabbis of past periods anticipated neither the wealth nor the longevity of many contemporary Jews. If they had, they surely would have insisted on even higher levels of giving.

Recognizing that we are far removed from the bare-bones survival of the immigrant generation, it may be time to reconfigure what is the right level of tzedakah and what we should expect from our givers. One of our philanthropic goals may be to develop an ethic of higher levels of giving in relation to net worth.

For a person with assets of $100 million – and there are many such people today – annual philanthropy of $500,000 or $1 million is not serious. Yet, the community fawns as if these individuals have given amounts that are truly selfless.

At present, there is little accountability between wealth and philanthropy. This must end. A person earning $45,000 who gives $5,000 in tzedakah should be acknowledged as heroic even though he may not get his name on a building.

We need to become part of a movement to change the perception of giving, to spread the notion that real meaning in life comes from selfless acts of philanthropy, and to inculcate a sense of responsibility for the fate of klal Yisrael among those who have achieved high levels of wealth.

The challenge is daunting. In a community where people want their names up in lights, where we have a cadre of professionals known as "directors of development" whose ambition is to separate rich Jews from their money, how can we create a sense of justice, of fairness between rich and poor, and recognize true philanthropy? How can we accomplish this in a free and open society?

On the one hand, we value our privacy. How many of us enjoyed the public displays when there was card calling at events? For many of us, there is something unseemly about it. I'm not immune to the conflict. In my various philanthropic efforts, I have valued the Maimonidean principle of modesty and indeed anonymity. Yet I, too, have had my name put on some projects and buildings. I frankly feel deeply conflicted.

I think it is a higher calling not to use one's name, but I haven't always been able to reach that higher level.

One of the goals of the emerging Fund for Our Jewish Future is to usher in a culture of vastly increased levels of Jewish giving. The fund plans to raise tens of millions immediately for priority action in Jewish education.

Hopefully, this will be followed by a series of focused funds to revive Jewish commitment levels. Another goal of the fund is to approach individual communities and offer local philanthropists the opportunity to receive significant outside funds for projects that they are prepared to give meaningful down payments toward.

It is clear that what we need is imagination to view our Jewish future in a way that will capture the spirit of those Jews who are mostly on the sidelines today.

We don't have many of the needed answers. But through hard work, creativity and, again, imagination, we can begin to reach the presently unreachable. With success, the result will be a renaissance of Jewish life in which our flourishing communal structures inspire greater Jewish involvement and commitment which in turn inspire even greater levels of tzedakah.

From Purim to Pesach

Between Purim and Pesach, life gets very hectic. I love both holidays, but the level of work and preparation associated with them compounds my sense of pressure. Why are the days so full, the time so short, and the workload so extreme? Why are the holidays so close together and so demanding? In the fall, we are overwhelmed with a month of holidays. Given an agricultural lifestyle, that may have been well and good. The harvest was in, and people could relax with ritual and celebration. But I do not farm!

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Nonetheless, I love the holidays – Passover the most. It's a time for family and children. And between the two, we can find many points of similarity. Certainly they both fit our national storyline: they tried to destroy us, we survived, let's eat!

But they're also special in their expressed focus on children. From costumes and plays to questions and presents, both try to attract and engage our kids. Consequently, there is a substantial emphasis on family. I love the sense of squeezing all of us around the table for the seder, of beds overflowing, of coffees and talks and laughter. Family spending serious Jewish time together.

And both holidays direct us to the community, signalling a sense of communal freedom and responsibility. From Esther's request that the people fast for three days, to the command to send food gifts, to the communal songs of Miriam and Moses at the sea, to the obligation to share the Passover meal with others, to the impossible claim to experience the redemption ourselves, we create and celebrate community. These ritualized moments declare: We are the Jewish people, we are here to stay, and we are vigorous.

Those are all powerful lessons. But there are more, and I fear we often lose sight of them in the face of other messages. While cleaning my stove, I don't stop to think what all this means to me as an individual Jew, with spiritual needs and realities. I am fully aware of my role as a mother and grandmother, as a cook and preparer. What I don't spend time on is my place in these stories as a Jew, especially on Passover.

At our women's megillah reading on Purim, I do get to teach a class that focuses on the spiritual. But on Passover, it's harder to devote time to the basic, overriding themes of the holiday – themes of redemption, survival, responsibility, and my role as a Jew, a part of a nation of survivors who bring to this world notions of justice, righteousness and hope. I see myself embedded in a sea of rituals whose purpose is not just social relationships but also personal devotion and deliverance.

Budget cuts threaten our special ulpan

In the days after the 1967 war, when anything seemed possible – even peace – our family of two adults, a three-year old and a one-year old embarked on a six-month sabbatical to Jerusalem. Our goal was to study spoken Hebrew while touring Jerusalem and Israel.

We scored a central, and very sparsely furnished, one-bedroom apartment on Rehov Lincoln. The baby came down with red spots all over her body and screamed a lot, while the three-year old found that the most entertaining games were to be played in the dirt outside our front door (it was supposed to be a garden, but believe me, it was just dirt).

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

All was eventually well when we put the grimy three-year old in a gan and found an adoring family to look after the spotty baby. Now, what to do about Hebrew?

The best place for us was the Beit Ha'Am, a municipal ulpan where six mornings a week we struggled to get our tongues around Hebrew. The experience will be remembered forever. So imagine our distress when we read last month in the Jerusalem Report that the Beit Ha'Am ulpan would soon be no more, a victim of Jerusalem's budget cuts.

Beit Ha'Am's ulpan is unique. It caters to Jews, Arabs, and (at least in our experience) Christians from abroad who come to Israel to learn Hebrew. In 1971, it was still fairly new, and our classroom was a miniature United Nations, albeit more harmonious.

In addition to us, the Canadians, the class included three Italian priests studying at the Pontifical Institute (their Hebrew was very biblical and heavily influenced by Italian, and they came to class every day in Bermuda shorts); some new olim from Czechoslovakia, Russia and France; a young student from Lincoln, Neb.; and a multilingual Christian Arab woman from Bethlehem who worked for the Tourism Ministry and was the best student among us. There were others, but these stand out in my memory.

We conversed at the hafsakah (break) in a mixture of Hebrew, French and English, since those were the languages we shared. Gathered from so many different religions and regions of the world, we got the opportunity to talk together about ourselves and create in that classroom the "common bond of harmony" that the siddur talks about but is so difficult to achieve.

For a short five months, at least we made a start. Nowhere else in Israel have we since met such a variety of people.

Our teacher, Edna, was a creature of infinite patience. For years afterward, she regaled classes with one of my husband's assignments, which described an archeological site we had visited. My husband dutifully consulted his Ben Yehuda dictionary for the Hebrew word for "archeologist." Unfortunately, no one had informed us that Ben Yehuda's word had morphed into the modern Hebrew slang word for "stripper." The class looked confused as Edna dissolved in laughter and explained that this young professor had spent a day with – well, you can imagine.

Then we did the lesson on shopping. This time, Edna kept her cool, but those in the class who knew some Yiddish went into convulsions when one lad informed us that he had purchased "two beitzim."

And then there was that deathless question, "Mi acharon ba-tor?" ("Who is the last one in line?") As any visitor to Israel knows, if you have to ask, the answer is, "You are!"

But Beit Ha'Am not only taught us some Hebrew, it introduced us to so many different people and points of view, and, in turn, let everyone get to know "the other." We became friends with the Palestinian Anna-Marie, who took us to her home in Beit Jala and introduced us to the intricacies of Christian-Muslim relationships in Bethlehem (which were not good and worsening). Not only did we go, but our teacher Edna came with us. It was the first time she had ever visited a Palestinian Arab home.

In the Jerusalem Report, Beit Ha'Am's director Yaakov Yaakov noted that few, if any, other places in Israel offer such contact. For us, for all our classmates, and for Edna as well, Beit Ha'Am was, to use his words, "nothing short of an eye-opening experience for everyone involved."

I hope it survives the budget cuts.

Multiculturalism and the Charter

Walking down a major street in any large Canadian city, one can readily observe the diversity that defines Canada's present makeup.

Demographically, Canada has undergone changes as a result of government policies that encourage increased immigration. And unlike the United States, which promotes the concept of a population "melting pot," Canada encourages all citizens to preserve their heritages as part of our cultural mosaic.

Since 1982 we have had a constitutional guarantee of multiculturalism.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

In particular, Section 27 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms requires that when interpreting and applying other rights and freedoms in the Charter, our courts are required to do so in a way that "preserves and enhances the multicultural heritage of Canadians."

Section 27 does not in and of itself grant any rights, but rather is an adjectival section. It serves to assist the courts in the interpretation of rights contained elsewhere in the Charter of Rights. Even though this use of the multicultural guarantee is of somewhat limited value, it does serve to reaffirm multiculturalism as a Canadian value whenever the section is used. How then has it been used?

During the first decade of Charter experience, from 1982 to 1991, Section 27 was used quite frequently, particularly in cases testing the assertion of freedom of religion, freedom of expression, egalitarian or equality rights and other miscellaneous parts of the Charter.

During the second decade of Charter experience, although the use of Section 27 declined, it was still employed in a number of ways.

Section 27 was invoked in some cases promoting egalitarianism. It was also used in relation to the legal rights sections of the Charter with respect to those persons in contact with the criminal justice system. One example of this is the right of an accused person to understand the language in which a trial is being conducted.

As well, many lawyers have added Section 27 to their Charter arguments in a last-ditch effort to win a case; however, in virtually all of these latter cases, the courts did not even consider the multicultural argument.

Today, there appears to be a continuation in the decline of the use and effectiveness of Section 27 as a useful constitutional tool in reaffirming an important Canadian value.

In the mid-'80s, there was a case in which accused individuals charged with assault wanted to wear their kirpans in court. The kirpan is a ceremonial sword that orthodox Sikhs are required to wear. In that case, the courts decided against the wearing of the kirpans in court, but the case did not reach the Supreme Court of Canada level.

However, just a few weeks ago, an important case was decided by the Supreme Court of Canada. The Multani or so-called kirpan case focused on freedom of religion and dealt with whether a local school board could prohibit a Sikh student from bringing a kirpan into a school. The Supreme Court supported the position that to deny a Sikh student permission to bring a kirpan into school constituted a deprivation of that student's freedom of religion.

Clearly, this case stands out as a strong statement in favour of minority religious freedom. This is important to all religions, especially where the numbers are few and the fight for religious freedom is an ongoing concern. Canadian Jews are well aware of this.

What is the significance of this case, apart from the obvious victory for freedom of religion? Does the case serve to buttress the legal recognition of multiculturalism in Canada?

Although the case was decided on the basis of freedom of religion, many hailed it as a victory for multiculturalism. In criticizing the decision, one columnist in the Globe and Mail described the case as "multiculturalism gone wild."

Significantly, there was reference in that decision to the notion of multiculturalism; however, Section 27, our constitutional guarantee of multicultural diversity, was not even used by the court.

What does this tell us? It tells us that diversity endures as an important Canadian value but also that the usefulness of Section 27 as a constitutional guarantee of multiculturalism remains in doubt. In short, preservation and enhancement of multiculturalism will not be significantly enhanced by the use of Section 27, but rather will depend almost entirely on the use of other sections of the Charter.

The Kirshner File

Kibbutzniks plagued by Qassam rockets

"For us, it's a way of life today," said Avi Kadosh, the secretary of Nir Am, a kibbutz of 400 inhabitants perilously close to the Gaza Strip. "We're so used to it. When we go to sleep at night, we know something will happen."

Sheldon Kirshner in Israel

Kadosh, 55, was talking about Qassams, the technically primitive but psychologically dreaded short-range rockets that have victimized adjacent southern Israeli settlements since 2002, the second year of the current Palestinian uprising.

Fired by militant Palestinian groups apparently beyond the control of President Mahmoud Abbas' Palestinian Authority, the Qassams have neither killed nor injured anyone here, but have caused property damage and have had a serious economic impact.

The story is more or less the same at Karmiyya, a neighbouring kibbutz that, like Nir Am, suffered from Palestinian fedayeen incursions in the 1950s, but enjoyed a long period of peace and quiet and prosperity from the 1967 Six Day War until the second intifadah.

Avi Kadosh

"This area was once really peaceful," said Zmira Levy-Cohen, a 43-year-old member of Karmiyya who has lived here since the age of 18. "But suddenly, we feel insecure. Suddenly, we're near the battlefield and in real danger. The Qassams have become a problem. We were complacent until now."

Approximately two months ago, she related, a 10-month-old toddler – the son of Jewish settlers evacuated from Gaza before Israel's unilateral withdrawal last summer and resettled in Karmiyya – was injured by a stray Qassam. As a result of the attack, about half of the 50 families from Gaza here packed their bags and departed en masse, eager to put the Qassams behind them.

For Israelis who live in this sun-blasted, hardscrabble region of the northern Negev Desert, the geography is fearsome and could not be more disadvantageous.

From the cultivated fields of Nir Am, founded in 1943 by immigrants from eastern and central Europe, the low skyline of Gaza is plainly visible. Beit Hanoun, where many of the Qassams have been launched by Islamic Jihad of late, is only two kilometres away. From Karmiyya, founded in 1950 by French and Tunisian Jews and later bolstered by immigrants from Argentina and Chile, Gaza City's white and beige buildings are easily seen.

Since its pullout from Gaza, Israel has responded to the salvo of Qassams by targeting Palestinian militants and by firing at Qassam launching sites. At Nir Am, on a ridge covered by camouflaged netting, the muzzle of a tank pointed in the direction of Beit Hanoun, a regular target of Israeli raids prior to the disengagement.

But no matter how often Israel shells Gaza, always taking care not to hurt innocent Palestinian civilians, the Qassams keep on coming.

As Kadosh, a Moroccan Jew from Casablanca who has resided here since 1971, tells it, Nir Am was hammered by 160 to 170 Qassams in 2004 and 2005. Since this past January, seven have landed on its manicured grounds. All in all, seven buildings have been struck, including the infirmary and a structure near the cutlery factory. One building was entirely destroyed.

"No one, so far, has been injured," he said. "It's a miracle."

The reign of terror to which the Palestinian Qassams have subjected Nir Am has had severe consequences.

Older residents have been rattled. Children have had nightmares and wetted their beds. Two families left, but one family reconsidered and returned after two months.

Nir Am's bed and breakfast business, as well as its motel, are virtually empty these days. "We have lost millions and millions of shekels," noted Kadosh.

But Nir Am's agricultural sector, consisting of wheat, potato and melon fields and citrus orchards, all irrigated by recycled water provided by the Jewish National Fund, have been unaffected by the rain of Qassams.

The government has reinforced the roofs of the children's houses, upgraded existing shelters and brought in new concrete shelters. And while Kadosh is grateful for the help, he believes that the government is duty-bound to reinforce every last building on the kibbutz.

Ironically, the majority of the kibbutzniks supported Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's disengagement plan on the premise that Israel's occupation of Gaza was untenable and foreclosed the possibility of reaching a pragmatic accommodation with the Palestinians.

Kadosh is not optimistic about the future. He expects more Qassams to hit Nir Am, the supply centre for regional kibbutzim during the 1948 War of Independence.

Yet he is far from certain whether Israel's reoccupation of Gaza would resolve the issue. "It would complicate our relations with the Palestinians," he said.

At Karmiyya, population 300, the Qassam problem has become acute only since last August, when Israel began moving the settlers out of Gaza.

"Almost every day, there are landings," said Levy-Cohen, speaking in an office adorned with six framed photographs of kibbutzniks killed in Israel's wars since the 1956 campaign. "Usually between 6 and 7 a.m. and around 7 p.m. It's like clockwork. You can set your watch to them."

Concrete bomb shelters in Karmiyya sent in by the government

In a reference to the radar system that gives residents advance warning of a launch, she said, "We have, at best, 20 seconds to escape to a shelter."

Most Qassams fall harmlessly in the fields, and some are not discovered until days later. Recently, a Qassam shattered a tombstone in the cemetery.

The effect of the Qassams has been visceral.

"Children are afraid. They wake up at night. You think twice about going out in the evening. We have no defences against the Qassams. Suddenly, you hear a big boom, a bang and glass shattering. It's only a matter of luck there haven't been more injuries."

She added, "We also hear the sound of our artillery firing back."

Not a single kibbutznik has left Karmiyya whose economic well-being is dependent on cattle and citrus – but Levy-Cohen acknowledged that living under this kind of constant pressure exacts a toll.

Several members with younger children may well leave the kibbutz if Israel cannot crush the Qassam launchings, she conceded.

Zmira Levy-Cohen

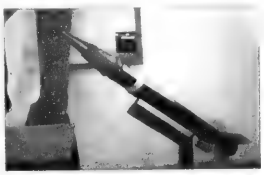
Meanwhile, property values have plunged, and at least a dozen children who attended Karmiyya's day-care centre have been withdrawn by their anxious parents, further hurting the kibbutz's economy.

In an attempt to protect the kibbutz, the government has sent in about 40 concrete cubicle shelters. But to Levy-Cohen, this is merely a half measure. More such shelters are needed, and children's homes have yet to be properly reinforced.

Asked about the future, she said glumly, "We don't know what will happen. We hoped the situation would improve after the disengagement. We thought the Palestinians wanted to live in peace and reconstruct their lives."

The vast majority of the kibbutzniks, she said, embrace a two-state solution. "We want to have peaceful, neighbourly relations with the Palestinians. I remember going to Gaza to buy furniture. I felt safe, but now, the situation has changed."

Before the current intifadah, Karmiyya employed a steady stream of Palestinian labourers from Gaza to work in the citrus groves and on building projects. But today, the kibbutz employs only one Palestinian worker.



A Qassam rocket on display at Nir Am

"We had good relationships with them," she said, her voice tinged with sadness.

Her hopes for peaceful coexistence with the Palestinians have been shattered by Hamas' victory in January's parliamentary election.

As she put it, "Hamas doesn't want us here. Maybe they will give us a hudna, a ceasefire. But they won't recognize our right to be here."

Philosophically, Levy-Cohen opposes the idea of using military means to resolve the Qassam problem currently plaguing Karmiyya. "Force is not the solution," she mused. Yet reality bites. "Maybe we'll have to use force," she said seconds later.

She added a sober qualifier: "In the long run, force only brings more force."

Israel called emerging node in the global economy

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

While the global economy has historically been hierarchical, with certain countries or cities dominating various eras, modern trade is more like a network and Israel is a rising star among global trade "nodes," says Hebrew University professor emeritus Arie Shachar.

The change is not just one of scale, Shachar told listeners on March 16 at the annual Andrea and Charles Bronfman Lecture in Israeli Studies, presented at the University of Toronto.

Geographical distance is no longer the obstacle to trade it once was, he said, and globalization has eliminated borders, creating what he called a "seamless economy."

With a 40-plus-year career in urban geography and economics that has included consultancies to national governments and the United Nations, as well as the Israel Prize for academic research, Shachar has recently studied how cities in Israel are affected by centres of high-tech research and development.

When Intel built its controversial $1.6-billion (US) "Fab 18" plant in Kiryat Gat in the northern Negev six years ago, there was heated debate over planned government contributions of approximately $600 million.

Shachar said his latest study reveals that this investment was justified.

"Intel had a tremendous impact– not so much on the town itself," but in the "expanding labour market throughout the entire north of the Negev," he said.

Though Fab 18 was Intel's most modern plant at the time, it has since become obsolete. The company is now planning "Fab 28," a new plant that could cost up to $4.5 billion.

"All major international high-tech corporations keep large research and development centres in Israel," including IBM, Microsoft, Siemens and Motorola, Shachar said, adding that their presence highlights Israel's growing role as a technological and economic node.

Israel is poised to take advantage of this for many reasons, Shachar said. For example, some 55,000 scientists and technicians came as immigrants from the former Soviet Union, and Israel also trains many itself. While Canada has 55 scientists or technicians for every 10,000 workers, in Israel, there are 140.

"Brainpower and experience are in abundance in Israeli society," Shachar said.

Israeli business also benefits from the influx of young technicians coming out of the army each year. As well, Israeli expatriates climb the corporate ladder in their new countries to the point where they can play a role in bringing technology centres to Israel.

At more than one per cent of GDP, Israel also has an extremely high rate of venture capital funding. The equivalent number for Canada is .3 per cent of GDP, and in France, it's only .1 per cent.

"Almost overnight," Shachar said, Israel has gone from being known for agriculture to developing "the most sophisticated electronic gear… [and] defining the frontier in software development."

Citrus, once the symbol of advanced Israeli agriculture, is now a declining export, and software represents 40 per cent of total exports, he said.

Shachar's studies have compared indicators of Israel's global ranking on many scales: its level of entrepreneurship, for example, is third in the world, the same ranking as Canada.

Perhaps the best-known indicator is the Foreign Policy Magazine Globalization Index, which ranks countries using four criteria: political engagement, technological connectivity, personal contact and economic integration.

Israel receives low marks for political engagement, due to its relative isolation at the United Nations and in other global organizations.

But the other three measures, particularly technological connectivity, rocketed Israel from 22nd place overall in 2004 to 17th in 2005, ranking it in the global top 20 for the first time.

Israel's high level of integration into the global economy can be measured in other ways, Shachar said.

Israel has the third-highest number of U.S. patents of any non-U.S. country. On the NASDAQ stock exchange, Israeli firms are the most-traded non-American companies after Canada's, and there are more Israeli high-tech companies on NASDAQ than all western European companies combined, he said.

Though the current boom began in the mid-1990s, Israel's technology sector was briefly hit by the worldwide tech slump of 2000 to 2003 and is just beginning to recover to pre-2000 levels of investment and growth.

Shachar also focuses on how all these rapid changes affect Israelis. He noted that the vast infusions of investment capital haven't trickled down to average Israelis and have led to greater polarization between rich and poor.

This isn't unique to Israel, he said, and is a common argument against globalization. But globalization is "irreversible," he added. "It's going to stay with us."

Rather than damming the flow of foreign investment, he said, it's up to Israel's new government to redistribute resources and convince ordinary Israelis – and the global community – that the face of globalization can be "humane and considerate."

CHAT students address situation in Africa

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Acol Dor, a Sudanese-born physician whose warmth and ready smile belie the horrors she witnessed as a child, described her experiences for a rapt audience last week at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Tanenbaum campus in Downsview.

Dor, the co-director of Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan (CASTS), joined Danny Richmond, assistant national program director of Canadian Young Judaea and director of the organization's Va'ad Tikun Olam, and Jonathan Laski, director of media for STAND Canada (Students Taking Action Now: Darfur) to speak at a school-wide assembly organized by a committee of students as part of the school's annual "awareness week."

This year's event focused on the situation in Africa in four main areas of concern: AIDS, poverty, child soldiers and genocide. The assembly was part of a week-long program including a coffeehouse fundraiser for War Child Canada, (an organization that helps children affected by war), lunchtime presentations, and an NGO (non-governmental organization) fair.

"I don't want somebody to go through what I went through," said Dor. Her happiness as a seven-year-old child was shattered when she witnessed soldiers rape her sister and torture and maim her father before killing him.

Beckie Cherniak – a member of the organizing committee along with fellow students Heather Douglas, Michael Herman and Lauren Silver – wrote an impassioned e-mail to The CJN prior to the assembly, indicating the strong feelings behind the undertaking.

"How can we as Jews say 'never again' in a few weeks on Yom Hashoah when there is a genocide taking place right now in Sudan, festering into Chad?" she asked.

"How can we stand by when 14 million children will be left orphaned throughout Africa when 2.6 million people die from AIDS just this year in Africa?"

Richmond, who worked at a children's centre in Ghana last summer, kicked off the assembly with some background on Africa. Among the statistics he cited, he said that more than 100,000 child soldiers in Africa were being forced to fight. Every night, he said, 40,000 children in Northern Uganda leave their homes and travel for kilometres on foot to avoid being abducted. "We must do something to help them."

He urged students to educate themselves and others. "Before understanding the solutions, you must understand the problems," he said. "Read books, watch the news, go hear speakers, watch films that focus on important issues, [then] put your knowledge into action… [through] fundraising and advocacy. Use your minds, your unstoppable passion and your creativity."

Laski said the world has done "almost nothing" to help people in Darfur, in western Sudan, where 400,000 have been killed by violence, malnutrition and disease, and 2.5 million have been driven from their homes by people burning their villages.

The "unfortunate truth," he said, is that "we create a culture of excuses including distance and busy lives.

"Make the [politicians'] phones ring," exhorted Laski, who was part of a delegation to Ottawa last year to lobby then prime minister Paul Martin about the Darfur issue.

The audience has a "special responsibility" as Canadians, students and Jewish people to address the issues, he said. A recent graduate of the University of Western Ontario, Laski said "people really do listen to students." His organization offers resources so that students can become involved in lobbying government and media, as well as organizing fundraisers.

Brothers share teaching philosophy, sense of humour

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jordan Sable, a teacher with a low-key classroom style and a signature baseball hat, is sometimes known as "the other Mr. Sable" at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Tanenbaum campus.

"They are our teachers..."

His younger brother Josh, who teaches dramatic arts and is director of student activities at the Downsview school, began teaching there in 1998, a year before he did.

The brothers, 38 and 33, share a sense of humour, a similar teaching philosophy and a family interest in education that often manifests in dinner table discussions at their parents' Shabbat table.

A lesson from the teachers: "It all starts with trust. You have to establish that [the classroom] is a safe place. The way you do that is by treating everyone decently," says Jordan Sable.

Josh adds, "Work doesn't have to always be very serious. Learning is fun, and it's contagious."

Their mother, Gayle, is a former teacher, and their father, Martin, left a career in law after 25 years to become a teacher. Jordan's wife Kate teaches at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, and Josh's wife Simona – his high school sweetheart when he was a CHAT student – is a speech pathologist for the Toronto District School Board. Their brother Jamie, 35, a psychiatrist, lives in Vancouver with his family.

Although both Josh and Jordan are CHAT alumni – as are about a dozen of their colleagues – "after the first 30 seconds, there's not much that's weird" about being back at the school, Josh said.

Instead, he sees it as an asset. Students know "that you've been there and you get it. You understand the workload and the demands on the students."

"You understand what the kids are about," added Jordan, who returned to Toronto to become a social sciences and history teacher after a decade doing graduate work in history in the United States. Although he enjoyed it, as he approached his 30th birthday, the idea of returning to his own community and working at a school like CHAT, with which he has a connection, seemed increasingly compelling.

Jordan, now the father of a baby boy, spent his first few years at CHAT doing the "Buffalo shuffle," heading off to Canisius College in Buffalo, N.Y., every week to complete his bachelor of education degree.

At one point the brothers taught the same media course. Now, although there are days when they don't run into each other at school, they still "bounce ideas off each other" and brainstorm about issues.

Josh admires the way Jordan "challenges his students to think and be analytical in a way that maybe they're not used to, but he does it in a non-threatening way." In 2002, Jordan – who like his brother, has a background working at summer camps – was named a Teacher of Excellence, a privately sponsored award for Toronto Jewish day school teachers.

Jordan, in turn, praises Josh's ability to take "kids who are going in a million different directions, and somehow with only a few words move them in a direction that works."

Josh, who has taught classes on classroom management and "creativity in the classroom" at UJA Federation Board of Education's Midrasha L'Morim, studied theatre as an undergraduate at York University. He entered teaching because he realized how much he enjoyed working with young people at summer camp. The father of two young children is still involved with camp during his summer break.

Being the school's director of student activities, a half-time position that involves supervising extracurricular programming, "is similar to being a program director at a camp, but in a school environment," he said. "I like the balance [between student activities and time in the classroom]... It allows me to be creative and get involved in a lot of creative projects like the talent show, the school play and the fashion/dance show."

The school has a "work hard, play hard" atmosphere, Josh said.

"I think you have to have that mix to be successful as a student, and as a teacher," added Jordan.

A wee lesson about our relationship with God

By RABBI REUVEN TRADBURKS

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

There is a little wee aleph in the first word of this week's Torah portion, Vayikra.

In a Sefer Torah, a Torah scroll, you will sometimes find big letters or small letters or dots over words. These are written in order to draw your attention to those words. I had a music teacher who would draw a little pair of glasses over a note or phrase that he wanted me to pay attention to. Well, the sofrim, the scribes who transcribe Torahs, don't write a pair of glasses (that's forbidden), but they make, based on tradition, certain letters bigger or smaller than others in order to catch your attention, or to indicate a double entendre – a secondary level of meaning.

So why does the Torah put a little wee aleph in the word "Vayikra?"

The words "vayikra el Moshe" mean "and He called to Moshe." If you drop the aleph, you end up with just "vayikar el Moshe" which means "and He happened upon Moshe".

Rashi understands the little wee aleph to be a statement of humility. Moshe felt very uncomfortable writing in the Torah that Hashem was calling him. It's one thing to say that I called the prime minister, but it's quite a different thing to say that he called me. Moshe squirmed a bit to write that Hashem was calling, so he was almost pretending that the aleph wasn't there – as if Hashem chanced upon Moshe, just kind of stumbled on him.

But which is it? Does He call us or do we call Him?

Rabbi Joseph Soloveitchik pointed out that this is one of the differences between Shabbat and Yom Tov. All Jewish holidays are a meeting of man and the Shchinah – the only question is who is inviting whom over to their house. Are we inviting the Shchinah into our home, or is the Shchinah inviting us into her home?

On Shabbat we invite her into our home, while on Yom Tov, she invites us into her home.

On Shabbat, we introduce Shabbat with Kabbalat Shabbat – welcoming the Shabbat into our shuls and into our homes. On Yom Tov, in the time of the Temple, we were commanded to go to the Temple on a pilgrimage. We were to appear before Hashem – or, in other words, He invited us to His home.

This year, the first days of Pesach lead right into Shabbat. So do we welcome the Shchinah on Shabbat with Kabbalat Shabbat? The custom in many shuls is that we do not sing Lecha Dodi, because the Shchinah is already here on Yom Tov, so we need not welcome her anew.

So Moshe was actually right to be humble about the thought that Hashem would call him. But he ended up writing that aleph in the Torah nonetheless – because, well, Hashem did call him.

We should be both humble and proud at the notion we have a regular rendezvous with the Shchinah – on Yom Tov we are her guests, and on Shabbat she is ours.

Rabbi Tradburks is spiritual leader of Kehillat Shaarei Torah in Toronto.

Google and Wikipedia in Hebrew

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

Without warning, Israel's online news landscape shifted this month. That's when Google came to town. Actually, Google has had a Hebrew presence for quite a while. But this month, Google turned heads with the launch of a Hebrew version of its news service. Today, we'll look at how you can use Google News to open your horizons to new Israeli publications and the latest news – and find out why many Israeli newspapers were less than thrilled about the newcomer.

The Hebrew Google News page looks identical to the English one except that all the layout elements have been reversed. [http://news.google.com/news?ned=iw_il] You can skim articles about politics, business and sports. When I looked, I saw articles from Maariv, and Ha'aretz, the websites of the radio stations Arutz 7 and Galei Tzahal, and some Hebrew sites that were less known to me Telesport, Kan Na'im and the Marker.

The site will be of particular interest to people who can read Hebrew but may not be able to type in Hebrew on their computer. Since the stories are laid out for you, are constantly being updated and link back to a variety of papers, it makes it easy to check what's new and just jump from story to story and news site to news site.

Google already has a lot of experience delivering news in many languages; however, Google noted that working in Hebrew was a bit different. "It's been fun and challenging to create this edition, having to accommodate text that reads right to left, and adjusting our algorithms to work with a whole new set of papers." [http://tinyurl.com/qzr3u]

Google News does not actually create its news coverage. Rather, it constantly trolls through other news sites looking for breaking stories. It collects and excerpts headlines and small photos, creating links to them from its central news page. And it does it all without any journalists. Instead, Google has written algorithms or mathematical formulas – to determine which news stories should receive the most prominence.

And that's where the controversy comes in. Right after it quietly launched its Hebrew service, popular Israeli sites including Walla! [www.walla.co.il/] and Yediot Ahronot's Ynet [www.ynet.co.il] told Google to keep its robotic hands off their content. "We asked to be taken off Google News until we finish examining the ramifications of the Google mechanism on the issue of copyright," said Ynet editor-in-chief Jon Feder. Walla! has hired a prominent law firm and is keeping its options open about litigation against Google. [http://tinyurl.com/lm2zp]

Ynetnews.com's Gal Mor said he thinks Google is making a mistake with its Hebrew news because programs are poor editors and cannot be trusted to decide which story should be given prominence. As well, questionable news sources are often listed next to credible ones. And Mor said there are just too few Hebrew news sources out there. "The Israeli engine contains just 100 content sources, as opposed to 4,500 in English." [http://tinyurl.com/laq6p]

Gal makes a good point. And right now, stories on Google are updated every few hours rather than every few minutes. But this is a new service, still in its beta or testing phase. So I feel that it is worth giving it a try – and the benefit of the doubt.

While you're waiting for the news to update at Google, here's another international site that has a strong Hebrew component – Wikipedia. [http://wikipedia.org/] Wikipedia is "a multilingual web-based free-content encyclopedia… written collaboratively by volunteers."

Barely five years old, the English version has more than one million entries, which dwarfs the Hebrew section's 33,676 entries. [http://he.wikipedia. org/] The Hebrew site can be searched by category (mathematics, Judaism, music, etc.) and key word. Featured articles are rotated regularly. And there's an interesting Did You Know section. Did you know that Golda Meir wanted to have a civil marriage ceremony but bowed to family pressure when her mother said it would kill her? [http://tinyurl.com/aeqdd]

Wikipedia is a collaboratively written site and inaccuracies (deliberate and accidental) slip through. But you are always welcome to set the record straight.

Journey to Jericho

By SHANE SPRING

Guest Voice

Last summer, I returned to Israel for the first time since my bar mitzvah, 34 years ago. This time it was our daughter Andi's bat mitzvah that took us there. Our trip had all the highlights we hoped for, and one that was beyond my imagination.

I was unexpectedly invited to go to Palestinian-controlled Jericho with Rabbi Mordechai Elon, rosh yeshiva of Yeshivat Hakotel, and Marc Belzberg, director of the One Family fund. I had no idea what type of adventure I was in for.

The alarm jarred me awake at 4:15 a.m. We made a very quick trip to Jerusalem. Waiting at the side of the road were Marc; Ronnen Harary, who was also from Toronto; and Kobe Kimchy and Shuval Schijveschuurder, two Israelis who were joining us on this journey. The five of us packed into Marc's vehicle, and within moments, took off like a bullet following Rabbi Elon, whose driver appeared to be Mario Andretti but turned out to be a 23-year-old driver by the name of Gad. When I asked him about his daredevil driver, Rabbi Elon assured me, "In Gad I trust."

At the final Israeli checkpoint before entering Palestinian territory, we rendezvoused with two buses filled with Rabbi Elon's Grade 12 students, as well as with a multitude of military personnel and lots of weapons, all overseen by the Israeli commanding officer, Motti. Our convoy headed towards the Palestinian checkpoint where Palestinian military officials and police met us.

The two commanding officers from the PA, Motti and Khalled, embraced and greeted each other in what appeared to me to be like two old friends. Now the convoy grew as the Palestinian military joined us. Our destination was the Shalom Al Yisrael (Peace Upon Israel) Synagogue of Jericho, which was founded in the Byzantine period – sixth century CE – and unearthed in excavations in 1936. It is one of only three sites in Arab-controlled territory to which Jews are guaranteed access by the Oslo accords of 1993.

The buses, military vehicles and all their occupants pulled up to what appeared to be a new two-storey structure. The building was surrounded with barbed wire and then a perimeter of Palestinian military – who I assume were present to ensure the safety and security of their Jewish "guests."

The structure was actually a house that had been built over the remains of the synagogue. After the 1967 war, Jewish tourists visited the site by paying an admission fee to its Arab custodian. In 1986, the Israeli National Parks Authority purchased the building, which eventually became a yeshiva.

The remains of the synagogue consist of a very detailed mosaic floor with images of a shofar, a menorah, a lulav and the name of the synagogue – Shalom Al Yisrael – delicately laid out in tile.

Following the signing of the Oslo accords, Jericho was officially handed to the Palestinian Authority, and access to the site became much more restricted and regulated. Today, the Israel Defence Forces visit the site once a week to maintain and ensure a Jewish presence in this holy site. Our visit was one of these scheduled visits, in this case with the stated purpose of dedicating a sefer Torah.

When the morning Shacharit prayers were over, the marching in of the sefer Torah took place amidst much fanfare and celebration as the Palestinian military looked on. As part of the ceremony, I was honoured with an aliyah. I could not believe it! Here I was in a shul from the sixth century CE, and I was taking part in the service – lifting the sefer Torah for all to see.

> 'I could not believe it! Here I was in a shul from the sixth century CE ... lifting the sefer Torah for all to see'

Once the ceremony was over, all that remained was to celebrate. I took the opportunity to speak in this rather intimate setting with the Palestinian commanding officer. I commented on how ironic and odd it seemed that he and Motti and the other soldiers were so friendly with each other, and yet they could be killing each other the next day. Through an interpreter named Sharon, Khalled responded: "If it were up to us here in the field, we could make peace. When left to politicians, that is when we have problems."

One hour and 95 pictures later, after an aliyah, a l'chaim and conversations with both Jews and Palestinians, we were on our way home, leaving Palestinian territory and heading back into Israel.

Suddenly, while still in Palestinian territory, but now without any military escort, I realized that I had left one of my camera lenses on the table outside the Jericho synagogue. I asked Marc what I should do. I had two phone numbers for Khalled – he had given his telephone number to Ronnen. Marc suggested that I try the numbers. I had nothing to lose but an $800 lens, he said.

I dialed and the phone rang "Khalled?" I asked.

"Yes, Khalled," he answered.

"Me Canada" I said.

"Ah, Canada," he acknowledged.

Now where do I go? I wondered. I said, "I lost camera. You have camera?"

For fear that he did not understand my Arabic English, I asked in Hebrew if there was anyone who spoke English. Sure enough, someone got on the phone who spoke a broken English and he tried to convey that they had the lens – "Me have camera."

I doubted I had understood correctly and I asked if anyone there spoke Hebrew, figuring I would put Marc on the phone. Once on the phone, Marc laughed when the suggestion was made that we turn around – "Yeah, right, I am going to turn around and go back there."

I eventually got Sharon, the soldier who was the interpreter in my initial conversation with Khalled, to phone and make whatever arrangements he could.

An e-mail I received from Marc Belzberg the next day summed it up: The Israelis were "amazed at how things went collecting the lens. It seems that there is very little contact with the other side and the relationship had been on eggshells recently. For the Israeli team, retrieving the lens was a serious test of their co-operation and of the Palestinians' desire to retain good relations." He said it took only one phone call and they brought it right to the checkpoint.

Just two weeks later, the lens arrived back in Toronto – safe and sound and having maybe played a small role in improving co-operation between two peoples who one day will have to figure out how to live side by side. It seemed fitting that it was a lens that brought focus and clarity to two opposing sides.

I'm grateful to all those involved in this adventure. To those of you who are soldiers in the Israeli military, I thank you for not only defending the Land of Israel but also defending us – Jews in the Diaspora who would not exist if it were not for that which you sacrifice your lives for – Israel!

York U unveils $100-million fine arts centre

By TANIA HAAS
Special to The CJN

The Accolade Project, York University's new teaching, exhibition and performance complex, officially opened on the first day of spring.

Lorna Marsden, the university's president; David Caplan, Ontario minister of public infrastructure renewal; Julia Foster, member of the Accolade Project campaign cabinet; Jan Hesseling, consul general of the Netherlands; and Gary Brewer, York's vice-president of finance and administration cut the ribbon at the launch of the $107.5-million expansion and renovation project.

"This building is a training place, and it was the result of the faculty's vision for studio and performance activities," said Phillip Silver, York's dean of fine arts.

"Special learning and special talent need to train in a special place. And now we have that place."

Silver has been the dean of the faculty of fine arts since 1998, when plans for the building gained momentum. He is a stage designer and he was a consultant for the renovation of McGill University's Moyse Hall and the theatre at the Canadian Museum of Civilization, as well as other Canadian performance facilities.

Working on The Accolade Project allowed him to translate his skills in set design to influence the cultural landscape of the GTA. "The geographic centre of Toronto is changing and we very much hope to be a part of that change," he said.

York University student dancers, the Sashar Zarif Dance Ensemble, performed at the launch of the university's new arts centre, the Accolade Project. York president Lorna Marsden is in the background, holding a wineglass.

Silver envisions artists showcasing their productions at Accolade, which houses York's departments of music and dance, as well as the Art Gallery of York University. The project also provides an entertainment venue for the burgeoning north Toronto and York Region communities.

Accolade's facilities include a 325-seat recital hall with an integrated recording studio; a 325-seat proscenium theatre with orchestra pit; and state-of-the-art classrooms, labs and studios. The structure has been designed to allow for subway access when the TTC is extended to York's campus.

Up until now, music students practised in converted dining halls and were marooned to the outskirts of campus.

Andrew Craig, York alumni and host of CBC-Radio's In Performance, likened the music students to "ferrets" hiding on the fringes of York.

"I like what you've done to the place, Dean Silver," said Craig before introducing the recital hall's inaugural concert.

Music student James McEleney, a bass player, was the only student playing in the York Faculty/Student Jazz Quartet, which performed at the concert.

"We had a fantastic faculty before this building, but now we have the space to showcase our work. And it will probably give us the public we need," he said.

The building makes the arts accessible to the non-art student and general public. For example, two to three times a week, the music department will put on noon-hour performances.

"We want to engage the general public. We have to – they are our future audience," said Silver.

Israel-bashing wolves wear academic tweed

"The Israel Lobby" is a lengthy essay spanning nine pages in the March 23 issue of the London Review of Books. Written by U.S. academics John Mearsheimer and Stephen Walt, it's a heavy-handed attempt to undermine American support for Israel by impugning Israel's moral standing and its historical record, and by portraying it as wantonly aggressive and rejectionist toward the Palestinians and Arabs.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

What is especially troubling is that this polemic comes not from well-known Israel-bashers but from mainstream academics: Mearsheimer is professor of political science at the University of Chicago and Walt is at the John F. Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University.

The London Review article is based on a purportedly academic 15,000-word treatise, "The Israel Lobby and U.S. Foreign Policy," published by the Kennedy School. Its more than 80 pages are divided nearly equally between text and footnotes, giving the tract the appearance of careful scholarship.

Mearsheimer and Walt describe their writing as fair-minded, even "objective," based on incontrovertible evidence. "Some readers will find this analysis disturbing, but the facts recounted here are not in serious dispute among scholars," they write.

Since it gives the semblance of academic authenticity, both the Kennedy School paper and London Review article (which in some respects exceeds the original paper in shrillness and sensationalism) are bound to have some influence in certain circles.

The paper appears on the third anniversary of the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, and comes at a time when things are not going well there for U.S. President George W. Bush. Recrimination in the United States is growing, and the paper may be a prime example.

The paper's principal argument is that the U.S. pro-Israel lobby, aligned with mostly Jewish neo-conservatives who pushed for the war against Iraq, has manipulated U.S. foreign policy to secure American protection for Israel at the expense of U.S. national interests.

There is "little doubt that Israel and the [pro-Israel] lobby were key factors in shaping the decision for war. Without the lobby's effort, the United States would have been far less likely to have gone to war in March 2003," Mearsheimer and Walt wrote in the Kennedy school paper.

In the meantime, they argue, "Israel's enemies get weakened or overthrown, Israel gets a free hand with the Palestinians, and the United States does most of the fighting, dying, rebuilding and paying."

Space does not permit a rebuttal of the article's superabundant factual errors and distortions, including its principal thesis. What follows is a very small, though illustrative sample, at least with respect to Israel.

• The article ignores the fact that Iran is a major threat to Israel, even though it "is hundreds of miles away," as the authors note, precisely because Iran is developing nuclear weapons and already has long-range missiles capable of delivering nuclear warheads to Israel and its leader has repeatedly declared that Israel ought to be "wiped off the face of the earth." Also overlooked is that Iran is a threat to the peace and security of many other countries, including the United States, an oversight that's coupled with the authors' erroneous allegation that Bush is confronting Iran mainly because of pressure from the "pro-Israel" lobby.

• The authors repeatedly cherry-pick phrases out of context from Israeli sources such as journalists Ze'ev Schiff, Aluf Benn and Yossi Klein Halevi in order to push a grossly one-sided indictment against Israel and the "Lobby."

• The paper overlooks the historical reality that successive Israeli governments under prime ministers Yitzhak Rabin, Shimon Peres and Ehud Barak sought to reach genuine territorial compromise with the Palestinians. It insists that Israel has "refuse[ed] to grant the Palestinians a viable state of their own."

• It ignores Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza and the northern West Bank in August 2005.

• The paper claims the U.S. and Israel failed to support and negotiate with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, and ignores the fact Abbas was unwilling to assert his authority against Palestinian extremists and terrorists, as he had promised.

What is most striking about Mearsheimer and Walt's article is not that it displays a bias, but that it is so blatantly one-sided – so oblivious to abundant countervailing evidence and argument as to result in a caricature of scholarship. It's dangerous precisely because it will be taken seriously by moderates impressed by the appearance of scholarly rigour.

New features in store for 2006 Walk With Israel

Annual event hits the streets on Sunday, May 28

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

Felicia Posluns remembers walking for Israel as a child. "To me the old UJA Federation Walkathon was walking 20 miles from way up north to City Hall, back up north. You had blisters on your feet. It was a real accomplishment."

The event has changed since then, but the feeling of camaraderie, the pride in completion, and the support for Israel has stayed the same.

"This is much more of a party," says Posluns, who now serves as co-chair of the Walk, along with her sisters-in-law Nelly and Sara Zagdanski. "This is walking with lots of people and really celebrating together, keeping the whole community together."

This year's UJA Federation Walk With Israel, which will be held on Sunday, May 28, has a few new things in store.

For the first time, walkers can create a personal donation web page complete with their photo and a personal note to family and friends. Sponsors who donate online will automatically receive a tax receipt for donations of $10 or more. The Walk With Israel website, www.ujawalkwithisrael.com, also features contests, a route map and information on the event.

ARR-YEAH the Lion, the friendly mascot of UJA Federation's Walk With Israel, is back this year as the Walk takes place on Sunday May 28.

At the Walk, participants will be entertained by DJs from five different companies: Corey Mandell, Superior Sound, Mint Events, Magen Boys Entertainment, and Sole Power.

The party atmosphere will continue with the RioCan Carnival at the end of the Walk. It will feature hair colouring, airbrush tattoos, face painting by Party Impressions and giveaways by Incredible Novelties. "This year we're taking the RioCan Carnival to a different level," says Nelly Zagdanski. "It will be a fun carnival atmosphere, with rides, pretzels, and cotton candy."

Another new feature is the Office SuperCentre Treasure Hunt. Children will follow clues to find replicas of Arr-yeah the Lion, the Walk mascot, hidden along the route.

"It's a family day, it's a community day, it's a fun day, it's a celebration day—it's a really feel good event," says Sara Zagdanski. "For people who have participated before, they understand that and it keeps them coming back."

The annual event raises money for UJA Federation activities, such as supporting underprivileged children, sending Jewish kids to summer camp, and birthright israel.

The Walk is the largest community event that shows our solidarity with Israel, says Nelly Zagdanski. "It's critical for the entire community to come out. We can only show our strength and solidarity and support by coming out in numbers."

For more information, please call the Walk With Israel Hotline at 416.631.5700 or visit www.ujawalkwithisrael.com.

Exhibit celebrates Toronto's Jewish business pioneers

Toronto's Jewish community boasts an abundance of doctors, lawyers, and large business owners, but that wasn't always the case.

A new exhibit, sponsored by the UJA Federation Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA) on the fourth floor of the Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services at 4600 Bathurst Street, celebrates the modest beginnings of Jewish Toronto's business community.

"Taking Care of Business: An Historical Glance at Business and Labour Within Toronto's Jewish Community," documents the role of commerce in the community.

As in most North American cities, Toronto's early Jewish immigrants had difficulty finding jobs due to language, religious, and occupational barriers.

"A lot of people who immigrated here started out as peddlers," says OJA director, Ellen Scheinberg. "Then they bought a little shop … a lot of them succeeded and became big businessmen or entrepreneurs, but it all started with the peddler."

Once they had raised enough money to settle down, common businesses for early Jewish Torontonians included restaurants, jewelry shops, clothing, shoe and hat stores, bakeries, butcher shops, pawn shops, and groceries.

Stores that were on the ground floor of the owners' home were especially popular, because they allowed the entire family to participate in the business.

The exhibit displays photographs, artifacts, and archival documents on loan from community members and drawn from the Archives' holdings. It features a wide variety of businesses and individuals, including Moishe Stern, the city's first Jewish milkman, Murray Koffler, working at his pharmacy during the early years, before he founded the Shoppers Drug Mart chain.

"People are intrigued to see early material from businesses that mean a lot to them like Tip Top Tailors, United Bakers and Koffler's Pharmacy," says Scheinberg.

"Taking Care of Business" was originally displayed at the United Jewish Communities General Assembly recently held in Toronto, and was sponsored by the Ladovsky family, owners of United Bakers Dairy Restaurant, now in Lawrence Plaza. "Our late father, Herman Ladovsky, was a man who loved his community," says Ruthie Ladovsky. "He loved going up to the Archives on a regular basis. He would go through old papers and pictures and try to shed some light on early Jewish Toronto."

Love blooms at Toronto's General Assembly

With three singles' missions and twelve years on the National Young Leadership Cabinet under his belt, Joel Alperson, incoming chair of the United Jewish Communities (UJC) annual campaign, had seen many couples meet through UJC programs. But he never thought it would happen to him. Certainly not at the General Assembly (GA), which took place in Toronto in November. "The GA didn't seem like the type of event where I was likely to meet somebody," he says.

The Omaha native, who has taken a leadership role with the organization that represents nearly 200 North American Jewish Federations, was at a GA cocktail party when an old friend from the Young Leadership Cabinet walked in. With him was Torontonian, Daphna Pollack.

"There was an instant chemistry," says Alperson. "We were laughing and having fun from the moment we met."

While they were talking, Pollack, who was working at the GA as a greeter, was holding her greeter's vest behind her back with her left hand. "I couldn't tell if she was engaged or married or anything," says Alperson. "It was driving me crazy."

Joel Alperson

Pollack - an active member of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto Young Adult Division - it turns out, was neither engaged nor married. The two had a long lunch the next day, and Alperson quickly decided to extend his stay in Toronto.

By the end of February, they were engaged. "I knew very quickly," says Alperson. "I felt so strongly about her, and our time together was so easy, so fun, so much laughter. There was no reason to wait. We're both old enough to know what we want."

This is an exciting time in Alperson's life for more reasons than one. Three days before the big proposal, Alperson was officially named national chair of the UJC campaign in the United States.

"These two events were both life dreams of mine," says Alperson. "If somebody told me these two dreams would've come at all—that's amazing. But within three days of each other—it's an embarrassment of riches."

Once wed, the newlyweds will live in New York, but these days Alperson is spending a lot of time in Toronto planning the May 29 wedding with his fiancée. "The distance makes it harder," he says, "but if there's a real desire to get together it will work."

French Jewish community is nervous following Halimi murder

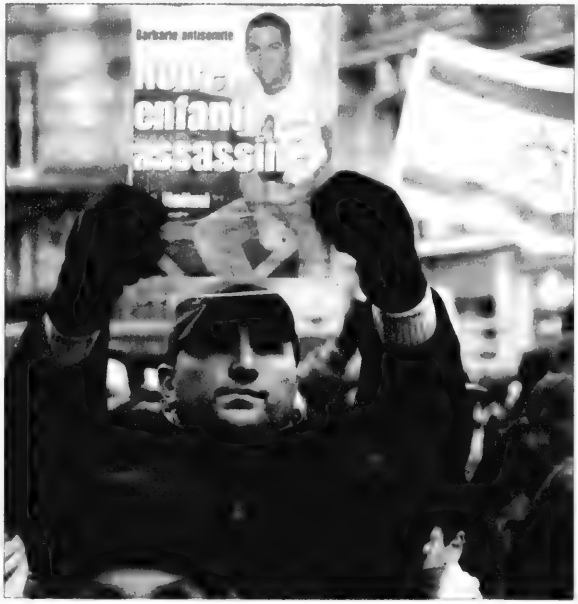
Authorities now more aware of potential antisemitic activities, says Paris-area resident

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Following the brutal torture and murder of Ilan Halimi, a 23 year-old Jewish man in Bagneux, France last month, Paris-area Jews are both more cautious and more wary.

That's the opinion of Yona Sperber, a 53-year-old Jewish woman, born and raised in Toronto, who has lived in Meaux, a small city just outside of Paris, with her Parisienne-born husband since 1995. A mother of three, Sperber says that while her family doesn't live in fear of antisemitic violence, there is now a palpable sense of caution in her community.

"Before Ilan Halimi was killed, there was already plenty of antisemitism in France, so, maybe that's why we're not so scared, we were so used to hearing about it," said Sperber in a telephone interview with Jewish Toronto. Sperber lived in North York before her move to Europe. "Believe me, when you live in Toronto and you walk along Bathurst Street, or maybe Bayview, you have a feeling of freedom as a Jew, a feeling of tolerance and acceptance. Not in France, here you have to be careful; you need to be aware of your surroundings. Since his death, my 20-year-old daughter, Laura, is now afraid to wear her Star of David outside the house."



A man holding a photograph of Ilan Halimi takes part in a march in Paris, France to show opposition to racism and antisemitism after his brutal killing. The sign says in French "Antisemic barbarism. Our child murdered". (AP Photo/Francois Mori)

"This case is the first time since World War II that a French person has been killed for being Jewish," says Roger Cukierman, head of the Representative Council of Jewish Institutions (CRIF), an umbrella organization of French Jewish organizations.

But, Sperber admits, if anything good could possibly come out of such a tragic act of hatred, she thinks it has.

"There's a lot more attention being paid to France's Jewish population; the authorities here are taking things much more seriously than they have in the past," she said. "It's a shame that it took this murder to make them understand, but maybe that poor man's death won't have to be in vain. Also, the schools, I believe, are teaching students more about the importance of tolerance, sensitivity, and respect for others."

Sperber points to an incident at a synagogue on Shabbat immediately following Halimi's murder.

"A group of young Arabs began roughing up a few Jewish kids after they came out of Shabbat services," she says. "I've never seen police respond as quickly as they did that day; they might not have taken that incident so seriously just a while ago."

According to Sperber, the Jewish community in her community and others, has responded to the murder by galvanizing itself, and talking openly of the situation with each other.

"Synagogues have been holding a lot of gatherings where Jewish residents get together and talk about the situation, what safety measures they should be taking, but mainly, I think, it's just a good way to show that we're together in this, as one strong community."

With the shloshim – the 30th day of mourning after Halimi's death on March 30 – nearly 2,000 visitors to the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto web site, www.jewishtoronto.com have sent condolences to the Halimi family. To include your name in the electronic condolence book, visit www.jewishtoronto.com and click the Halimi icon.

A kosher Pesach for Cuban Jewry

Imagine a Seder table without matzah, without wine, without kosher food of any sort.

Once again this year, Cuba's 1,500 Jews won't have to.

Almost 19,000 pounds of Kosher-for-Passover food are Cuba-bound, courtesy of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region

The Haggadah, which is read at the Passover Seder, clearly compels Jews to ensure that all who are hungry have a place at the table. Cuba's Jews are not immune to the rampant poverty on the island. Even a doctor or teacher makes no more than thirty dollars a month, and tourists often tell of children begging for soap, money, or food.

CJC's Ontario Region has been sending Passover food to Cuba since 1961. This year, for the first time, the program is being operated in conjunction with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, as well as other Ontario communities like Hamilton and London.

"It gives us an opportunity as a successful, well-established Jewish community to help another Jewish community fully celebrate Passover," says CJC Ontario Regional director Steven Shulman.

A young member of Cuba's Jewish community is all smiles after receiving kosher food from a joint UJA Federation/Canadian Jewish Congress food drive, ensuring a kosher Passover for more than 1,500 Cuban Jews. (Photos courtesy of Mircea Popescu Photography)

In Cuba, the food will be divided among the country's 540 Jewish families according to the number of people in each family. Everyone in the community receives enough kosher food for the whole week. While most of Cuba's Jews live in Havana, there are also communities in Santiago, Camaguey, Santa Clara, Cienfuegos, and Guantanamo.

"Kosher food is not available in this country; therefore the shipment from Canada of kosher foodstuff for the celebration of Pesach is vital to preserve our Jewish lifestyle and identity," said Dr. Jose Miller, and Adela Dworkin, the president and vice president of the Casa de la Communidad Hebrea de Cuba, a Jewish communal organization, in a February 15 letter. Sadly, Dr. Miller has since passed away.

Donations to the Cuba Food Drive can be made at www.ujadonations.com/pesachincuba

One cool way to spend a day

Hands On Toronto of UJA Federation's Young Adult Division, recently attracted over 80 volunteers who gave their time to do mitzvot (good deeds) all across the community. According to co-chair Tracey Steyn, "volunteers spread out across the GTA and lent a hand at seven diverse projects, including feeding the homeless, sorting and packaging food, painting and cleaning, and just generally getting their hands dirty while helping the community's most disadvantaged members."

"The spirit of the volunteers is absolutely amazing - they derive a tremendous sense of purpose in giving back and helping others less fortunate than themselves" explained co-chair Sharlene Milgram.

'Iraqi tradition is to keep the family close'

Michael Hyam, 27, tried out a few congregations before settling on the Iraqi one. "The davening [is] great, it's serious, and the people are really nice."

Fred Cowen, 32, adds, "We daven, we laugh, we love to sing. When there's a simchah, it's joyful... It's a great experience. It's very unique, it's warm and very welcoming."

Izy Hemi, a native of India whose grandfather left Iraq in the late 1890s, has helped keep Iraqi Jewish tradition alive in Toronto by reviving at least 20 traditional Iraqi tunes

Whenever there was a Jewish holiday or a special occasion like a wedding, he said, he would call Oren Eliyahu, the Iraqi Israeli cantor that the congregation brings in for the High Holy Days. "He would sing [the relevant songs] on my answering machine, and I would make copies of the recording, so we could learn the tunes."

Once the older congregants heard the recordings, the tunes would come back to them, said Hemi, a board member.

Iraq has a rich, 2,500-year Jewish history as home to the Sanhedrin and the burial place of the prophet Ezekiel and Ezra HaSofer, noted

Hemi and Aharon.

"Iraqi tradition is to keep the family close, and what keeps them close is the faith and spiritual tradition," said Sasson.

The congregation's current focus is to bring in more young adults like Hyam and Cowen, said Aharon. "We'll try to have more activities for the young guys and the singles."

Israel's security situation troubles settler leader

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When Israel Danziger looks at the situation facing Israel, both at the micro and macro levels, what he sees causes him no end of grief.

At the micro level there's increasing Palestinian violence – not perhaps of the spectacular bus-bombing variety, but deadly attacks nevertheless: shooting at Jewish drivers in the West Bank; infiltrations of settlements, stabbing attacks; children smuggling large quantities of explosives; rocket attacks.

At the macro level, Danziger, head of the settler advocacy group Mishmeret Yesha – the Guardians of Judea and Samaria – sees the conflict becoming more religious in nature, with Israel facing neighbours motivated by a theological desire to expunge the Jewish state.

Hamas has won the Palestinian parliamentary election with an avowed agenda of wiping out Israel, but Lebanon, Syria, Jordan and Egypt may all fall to Islamic governments in the coming years, he predicted.

And that doesn't include the growing menace from a nuclear-armed Iran.

"We're heading into very rough waters," Danziger said, "and the question is, what are we going to do about it?"

Danziger doesn't offer a specific solution. He was in Toronto to inform Canadian Jews about the situation in the West Bank and to convince Jews to change the way they think about the conflict.

"If you're not going to say it's a religious war, then we're just going to be playing games," he said.

Mishemeret Yesha is an umbrella organization founded in 1988 during the first Palestinian intifadah that provides a wide variety of services: it helps residents of the territories establish security committees, it provides free loans to upgrade security measures, it provides defensive equipment for West Bank vehicles, it provides free loans for medical equipment, it sets up mini trauma centres, it has created a security network in West Bank communities and it funds cottage industries in the territories.

As a spokesperson for the organization, the 53-year-old Brooklyn native travels to North America to raise funds and provide information about the reality on the ground faced by residents of the territories.

Some of the news he provides is good: despite continuing attempts at terrorist infiltration of settlements, increased security measures have succeeded in blocking many of the attacks.

Right around Purim, he said, the Israeli army caught two Palestinian youngsters near Nablus, each with 15-kilogram charges packed in large clay vases. "It was a Purim gift," he quipped.

Meanwhile, terrorists continue to fire an average of five rockets a day from Gaza, with one recently landing only 50 yards from the Ashkelon power station.

"This is some of what is going on. People here are not aware of this," he said.

While the Israeli army continues its incursions into Palestinian towns to disrupt planned terror attacks, the Palestinians continue to amass weaponry to be used after the Israeli election.

"It's only a matter of time before they will be lobbing rockets into Netanya, Kfar Saba, Ra'anana, Ben-Gurion Airport, the area around Jerusalem," and other parts of pre-1967 Israel, Danziger predicted.

Holocaust program marks fifth anniversary

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A Holocaust education program designed to heighten awareness among Canadian and European teachers marks its fifth anniversary this year.

Mark Webber

Michael Brown

The Mark and Gail Appel Program in Holocaust and Anti-Racism Education is the brainchild of two York University academics, Mark Webber and Michael Brown.

"We thought there was a need to ensure that the next generation of teachers would know how to teach the Holocaust and combat racism and anti-Semitism," said Webber, a professor of German studies.

An initiative of York's Centre for Jewish Studies and the Canadian Centre for German and European Studies, the program brings together Canadian and European university students.

Thirty two students – 16 Canadians, eight Germans and eight Poles – are enrolled in this year's program.

The vast majority are not Jewish.

"We want to get to people training to be teachers," said Webber, who is also director of the Canadian Centre for German and European Studies.

In a typical year, students spend two weeks in Poland and another two weeks in Germany, then they develop teaching materials. Later, European participants travel to Canada to present their projects and take part in seminars.

Webber believes the program, which was initially called "Learning from the Past, Teaching for the Future," has had a beneficial effect.

Students often spend two weeks in Poland and two inGermany

"The students tell us that the trip itself is life-changing and often determines their future career."

Having embarked on a teaching career, they make use of and build on what they've learned in the program, Webber added.

Polish graduates of the program have already published a volume of essays on the Holocaust, and in Germany, a book about the program's various projects is scheduled to be published shortly.

According to Webber, the program offers future teachers a unique opportunity "to connect the past with modern realities that can't be properly conveyed by textbooks alone."

Brown, the past director of the Centre for Jewish Studies and now a senior scholar at York, said the program's objective is to give the next generation of teachers in multicultural classrooms the tools "to dispel stereotypes" spawned by the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks in the United States and the current war in Iraq.

He added that participants "are extraordinarily aware of the potential for evil that racism presents and much more knowledgeable than their peers about the Holocaust and its implications for Jews and non-Jews in the past and the present."

Summarizing the program, Webber said, "By looking at the past, we prepare teachers to lead their students toward a better future. By looking at others, we not only overcome stereotypes about them, but also get to know ourselves better."

The project's official patron, Jutta Limbach, is president of the Goethe Institute and past president of the German Federal Constitutional Court.

It's funded by the Appels, the TransAtlantic Program of the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany, the Baden-Wuerttemberg Office for Civic Education, the Polish-German Youth Office, York University and its partner institutions in Germany and Poland, as well as private donors.

In addition, the Canadian embassies in Berlin and Warsaw, and the German and Polish consulates in Toronto, have provided assistance and support.

Ten recommendations offered to address anti-Jewish hate

The audit noted that in 2005 as in the two previous years, "the single most active group in carrying out anti-Semitic incidents was found to be made up of persons who identified themselves as Arab." The number so identified was 56, down from 80 in 2004.

The audit offered 10 recommendations to address anti-Jewish hate. Among them: publish guidelines for laying hate crime charges to ensure consistency across Canada; establish dedicated hate crimes units in all jurisdictions; criminalize membership in racist groups or display of racist symbols; amend the Criminal Code to include Holocaust denial as a hate crime.

"The elevated levels of anti-Jewish activity, compared to just five years previously, indicates that anti-Semitism is indeed an unfortunate fact of Canadian life," said Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice-president. "At present there is much you can say and do in Canada to invoke prejudice against Jews, with little recourse in the criminal justice system."

Obituary

Rabbi served Beit Rayim for the past 14 years

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Although his family anticipated a much smaller crowd, more than 700 people attended the funeral for Rabbi Sol Tanenzapf last week.

"He never made a big deal about how many people he touched," his son Melech Tanen told The CJN. In his eulogy, however, Tanen noted that people "in the most random places" have sought him out to tell of the late rabbi's kindness or helpfulness.

Rabbi Sol Tanenzapf

Rabbi Tanenzapf was part-time spiritual leader of Beit Rayim Synagogue for the past 14 years, following a decade leading Congregation Shaarei Haim.

He was also a humanities professor at York University, where he taught from 1968 until his death March 18.

Despite health problems in recent years, Rabbi Tanenzapf, who belonged to B'nai Torah Congregation, "attempted to live each day as normally as possible," said Rabbi Marvin Pachino, a personal friend who officiated at the funeral. He died in his sleep of a heart attack, having taught Greek and biblical traditions at York as usual that week.

Rabbi Tanenzapf's love of teaching was a major factor in giving his life purpose, said Rabbi Pachino. He also derived "profound spiritual satisfaction" from his congregational work, and adored his wife Elaine, the high school sweetheart he married in 1958, said Rabbi Pachino.

Despite Rabbi Tanenzapf's tendency to be self-effacing, "there was one thing that he was proud of and that was his grandchildren," said Tanen at the funeral. Two of them delivered eulogies, along with eight other friends and family members.

Rabbi Tanenzapf, a native New Yorker, received his PhD in Philosophy from Yale University in 1967. He was ordained from the Jewish Theological Seminary in 1968, and received an honorary doctorate of divinity there in 1994. He also taught there, as well as at the City University of New York, before coming to Toronto. Although he retired from York officially at 65, he continued teaching, and had only two weeks of classes left before he had to retire fully. He had just finished writing his students' final exam, Tanen said.

Rabbi Tanenzapf was "an excellent teacher devoted to his students," said Syd Eisen, who originally hired him to teach Hebrew language and Jewish philosophy at York. Over the years he also taught religious studies, spoke at academic conferences and published many papers.

The range of his learning was "enormous," and he was appreciated for his sincerity, integrity, kindness and decency, said Eisen, also a friend.

Colleague Martin Lockshin remembers the rabbi as "a brilliant man" who "truly cared about other human beings."

For Rabbi Tanenzapf's 69th birthday Feb. 22, his wife surprised him by distributing a compilation of his Divrei Torah in book form.

"He uplifted the spirits of his congregants not only with the message of his lessons but with the message and lessons of his own character," said Rabbi Pachino. Even so, he "was very down to earth. He wasn't above doing laundry, washing dishes and making breakfast for his wife every morning."

Chuck Ticker, a former president of Beit Rayim, said in his eulogy that, unlike other rabbis, Rabbi Tanenzapf "listened more than he spoke and shunned the limelight." When he did speak, he said, "you knew it was an important and a well considered opinion."

Ticker also commented on the rabbi's sense of humour, as did family friend Ruth Miskin, who called his monologues "devastatingly funny, wickedly creative and expertly executed."

In addition to his wife and and son Melech, Rabbi Tanenzapf leaves his son Shlomo Mark of Potomac, Md. and seven grandchildren.

Bomb-sniffing dogs help prevent suicide attacks

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

To sniff and protect.

The olfactory twist on the Toronto Police Services' motto would do well in Israel, where since 2003, a highly trained corps of sniffer dogs is said to have thwarted dozens of bomb attacks against civilians.

"Pups for Peace" has been so successful in the fight against terrorism that Israeli police have issued an urgent worldwide request for 200 more of the bomb-detecting canines, and 70 new handlers.

The cost: $2 million (US), which is why Pups for Peace (PFP) Canada is issuing its own urgent request for funds and volunteers to raise them.

"The program is definitely working," says Mike Freedland, executive director of PFP Canada. "It's a common sense solution."

PFP Canada was set up in 2004 and has raised $225,000 to date, most of which came from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. The Canada Revenue Agency recently granted the group charitable status, meaning it can issue tax receipts for donations, Freedland noted.

He added that volunteers are needed for event planning and fundraising.

Israel currently has about 100 sniffer dogs deployed in bus and train stations, crowded markets, malls, busy streets – anywhere front-line civilian defence is needed against an explosive device.

The objective is detection and deterrence, Freedland said. Pups for Peace's best customer to date has been Israel's transport ministry, he added.

Israel already has bomb-sniffing dogs in military and police units, but they have different duties.

Sniffer dogs used in Israel to detect bombs.

Each dog and handler team costs about $10,000 (US) to deploy. That includes the animal's purchase price, training and handling, veterinary care, kennel costs, and other expenses. The training period is two to three months.

Some costs are defrayed by the companies that use the animals.

PFP was founded by Glenn Yago, a Los Angeles economist who initiated the program in April 2002 in response to the Passover massacre at a Netanya hotel in which 29 Israelis were killed and more than 100 injured by a Palestinian suicide bomber.

At first, the dogs were trained in southern California and then shipped to Israel. But in 2003, a training facility opened at an old army base in the Golan Heights.

When the Israel Defence Forces and local police reported the effectiveness of the dogs, PFP received the blessing of the internal security and transportation ministries.

Spurred by statistics indicating that 60 per cent of terror attack casualties are bus passengers, a pilot project was initiated in Netanya in co-operation with the national bus company, Egged. The project's success resulted in several requests for dog-and-handler teams to be dispatched to bus stops across the country.

Freedland says that for security reasons, the Israeli government doesn't disclose how many attacks the canines have prevented. But a Las Vegas magazine has put the number at 70 in the first year the dogs were deployed.

In a case that made news in Israel last July, four explosive-sniffing dogs – Ruby, Heide, Mira and Moshe Herzl – thwarted a suicide bombing at Caf Caffit, a popular cafe in a trendy west Jerusalem neighbourhood. A Hamas operative wearing a gun and explosive belt was reportedly taken into custody.

In 2004, a bomb-sniffing dog fell in the line of duty. Toska, a three-year-old Belgian shepherd, died following an attack by Hezbollah on the Lebanese border that killed one Israeli soldier and wounded eight others.

Toska was given a full military burial at the IDF's Oketz (K-9 unit) cemetery.

Freedland says the dogs aren't limited to any breed. "They just have to have a lot of energy and stay active. And they're usually quite young." Generally, it's German shepherds, Labrador retrievers and Belgian Malinois that are preferred. Many of the dogs are purchased in Holland.

While they're well treated and fed, the professional life of a bomb-sniffing dog is only a few years.

How sharp are those wet noses? The Pups for Peace website says dogs can detect 19,000 types of explosives. The owe their talent to 250 billion olfactory cells in their nasal passages, compared to a mere 125 million for the inferior human proboscis.

They can also sniff through so-called junk odours – people, perfume, waste, even metal and zero in on the smell of an explosive.

"They're better than any machine," Freedland says. "They should be on every street corner in Israel."

Plan to keep active after retirement

By FRANCES GOODMAN PELLATT
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — We all know it is important to put away money for our retirement so that we can afford to continue living in the manner to which we have become accustomed. However, what about planning and preparing for filling up those hours that we once spent working?

Do we consciously and meticulously plan for our freer timetable as we do for our finances? Do we consider the fact that our days will not be filled with work-related responsibilities? Do we look at activities such as volunteering, taking courses or renewing hobbies?

> There is life after retirement; we just have to plan for it

One gentleman I spoke with said he always knew he would not have a problem filling his time once he retired. He noted that he had started reducing his work week several years prior to actually retiring. First he reduced his schedule to four days a week, then the following year to three days, and so on. Fortunately, as a medical professional, he was able to do this.

Now, fully retired at 70 years of age, he has more time to enjoy his grandchildren and look after his home and garden. He also taught himself to draw after reading Drawing on the Right Side of the Brain (a book by Betty Edwards that he highly recommends), and is taking art and painting courses. As men and women get closer to the age of 60, a time when some can consider taking early retirement and receive a government pension, many people are choosing to continue to work to age 65 or beyond because of the need to have something to do and to feel productive.

One woman who took the option of retiring early admits she did not think about what she would do after retirement, although she had five years to plan for it. She had thought she would continue doing private work in her field of expertise, but as yet, nothing has come of this idea.

"Of course I never considered I would just stay home and do nothing," she says, "and I'm now doing things for myself that I never had time for before, like playing bridge, exercising, visiting my children and grandchildren, and going back to doing sculpting, which I always loved."

She acknowledges that it is painful to realize she no longer is regarded as a knowledgeable, driven professional and feels she has lost her sense of identity and the respect she received when she was working.

"I sometimes feel guilty about not being productive in the way I was when working," she says, "and I know I can easily become depressed, but I am enjoying my leisure time and pursuing my own interests."

Whether we are self-employed or working for someone, eventually we all have to acknowledge the fact that it is time for lifestyle changes. We may not be able to manage the work physically any longer, or other considerations may force us to retire earlier than anticipated. But whatever the reason, we must put some thought into filling up our waking hours.

Retirement should be a time for yourself, a time to continue growing and learning and being rewarded for your efforts in a different way than receiving a weekly salary cheque. If there are things you liked to do when you were younger, but earning a living and raising a family took precedent over them, now is the time to pursue those interests.

Do you like to learn new things? Big cities have many institutions where you can enrol in interest courses – whether in the arts, the sciences or something else. Do you like to entertain or teach? Hospitals and organizations can use dedicated volunteers and offer training to enhance your skills.

Many people fear retirement as a bad thing. But giving up work does not mean giving up living. There is life after retirement. We just have to plan for it.

Passover Food Ideas

Distinctive, flavourful Passover wines from around the world

At Passover, more than on any other holiday, wine is a most important element. Wine is required for the seder, and having excellent wine gives this joyous yom tov a distinctive, memorable flavour.

For generations, Jews all over the world have gathered every year to recount our liberation from slavery to freedom. This year, as well as thinking about our fellow Jews in far away countries, you can bring them right to your elegant table. How? Serve some of the many superb kosher for Passover wines produced in the finest, international wineries, or present these wines as a gift for your host or hostess.

Israel: From the Efrat Winery, Israeli series, is the Cabernet Sauvignon-Merlot, 2004, winner of Bronze Model. Young, fresh and lively, with soft tannins and an appealing berry-cherry personality. Hints of spices and Mediterranean herbs add complexity.

The Shiraz, 2004, is delicious 100 per cent Israeli Shiraz, a fruity wine with pleasant plum and wine berry fruits. Intense red colour and lovely purple hues. On the palate, it exhibits full-bodied wine with fine, ripe tannins complemented by French oak.

A seder table as seen in Entertaining on the Jewish Holidays by Ella Banin, Modan publishing house.

Italy: From southern Italy, the Primitivo has a fearsomely intense depth of colour that gives the promise of much to follow. A huge bouquet, brooding, deep and filled with jammy fruit, with hints of vanilla and tobacco leaves, rose petals and a subtle hint of wood. Just like the nose, the mouth is also filled with interlocking sensations, with sweet fruit flavours on the entry. Deep ripe tannins hold everything together, right into the long, dry finish.

Chile: From Chile, three notable wines include the Alfasi Cabernet Sauvignon, light-bodied with soft berry flavours, the Alfasi Merlot RSV (Reserve) full and aromatic with a touch of oak, and the Alfasi Merlot, dry, light-bodied with a taste of ripe berries.

France: From France, the Baron Herzog selection is the Cabaret Sauvignon, a light and delicately styled red wine with a soft flavour and smooth finish.

Australia: From Australia, the Altoona Hills merlot is rich and complex, with layers of ripe plum and licorice flavours.

California: From Baron Herzog, the Syrah, with distinct berry and blackberry fruit notes, is highlighted by subtle oak with intriguing complexity.

South Africa: From Eshkol Winery, the Cabernet Sauvignon 2003, has won four medals, including the Gold Medal from the Tasters Guild International Wine Competition. Has a leafy, minty, stony elegance with firm tannins tailored for the table, and a dry finish with a long lingering aftertaste.

In Iran, 'charoset was our Passover treat'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Baking shmurah matzah in her native Iran was a major community event, says Soheila Sabeti.

"For three months before Passover, four or five bakeries were set up especially to bake the matzah. We would go to buy it in the middle of the night, because the bakers baked all day and then sold it at night when it was dry," says Sabeti, who left Iran in 1988 with her husband and two small boys.

These bakeries baked enough matzah to supply one neighbourhood in Tehran, which had about 80,000 Jews prior to the 1979 Islamic Revolution, she says.

"Our Passover preparations started before Purim because we needed to prepare everything ourselves. There were no commercial products," says Sabeti, director of admissions at the Toronto Heschel School.

"We had one room set aside most of the year for our Passover items, such as the pistachios and almonds that we bought raw and roasted ourselves."

After leaving Iran, Sabeti and her family lived in Israel for about a year. They came to Toronto in January 1990, and her third son was born five weeks later. Her boys are now 23, 21 and 16.

Sabeti says she still only prepares meat and pareve dishes during Passover, because there were no Passover dairy products in Iran, and she has continued the custom here.

The seder, which was conducted from a Farsi and Hebrew Haggadah, was similar to an Ashkenazi Haggadah, she says, "but we did have a few different customs. At one point, we would place three pieces of matzah on a large white table cloth, and we would all shake the cloth over our heads while we sang a blessing. It was very dramatic."

Soheila Sabeti

"We made enough charoset to last the eight days because it was our Passover treat. We ground dates, almonds, walnuts, and hazelnuts – some people added sesame seeds – and mixed it with wine or grape juice.

"It is still culture shock for me to see apples in charoset. It is supposed to signify the material the Jews used to make the bricks, and when charoset is made with apples, it is the wrong consistency. I still make it every year, whether or not I have a seder at my home."

A typical seder dish consisted of layers of rice, meat and potatoes, she says, and for dessert "we would place walnuts inside dates and roll then in sugar or shredded coconuts, or roast almonds and coat them with a paste of melted sugar and rosewater. Delicious!"

The end of Passover was also a special time, Sabeti says.

"We used to bring greenery and flowers into our home, and we served grains, and dairy products such as milk, yogurt and porridge.

"We would visit our friends and family and bring them flowers. That signified the start of spring and of better times."

Passover had a special feel, she says. "The food and energy was different. I still try to make it feel like the old days, but it's more convenient here. We see more and more Passover products. It takes away the feeling of Passover being different."

SOHEILA'S CHAROSET

450 g (1 lb.) natural almonds
250 g (1 cup) pitted dates
150 g (3/4 cup) walnut pieces
100 g (1/2 cup) white sesame seeds
500 ml (approx. 2 cups) sweet red wine or grape juice

Mix the first 3 ingredients in a large bowl and rinse with cold water. Add the sesame seeds to the mixer in the bowl and mix well. Using a meat grinder or electric blender, grind the mixture, gradually adding small amounts of wine or grape juice to the mixer until desired consistency is reached in the paste. The results will be more consistent by using a meat grinder.

The charoset can be refrigerated for up to 10 days in a tightly sealed container and makes a great low-fat, high-protein snack with matzah.

1 can (213 g) Clover Leaf® Ⓤ P Sockeye Salmon, drained
1 1/4 cup (300 ml) plain low fat yogurt
2/3 cup (150 ml) light mayonnaise
3 tbsp (45 ml) chili sauce
3 tbsp (45 ml) chopped chives or green onion
3 tbsp (45 ml) chopped fresh parsely

Remove skin and bones from salmon, if desired. In medium bowl, combine salmon, yogurt, mayonnaise, chili sauce, chives and parsely; mix until fairly smooth. Chill until serving. Serve with crudities.

NCJW food drive helps people in need celebrate holiday

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

If Paula Frisch and Sheila Mostyn had their way, the annual Passover food drive conducted by National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section, would no longer be necessary.

The co-chairs of the 23rd annual volunteer-run food drive, supported by Mazon Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, say it humbles them to know how many people need help and how much is needed to help them.

"We're also overwhelmed, though, with the community's help [in past drives.] It takes the whole community [to run the drive]," says Frisch.

Last year, she says, they delivered almost 2,800 boxes – compared to 239 boxes the first year – that were filled with basic food items necessary to observe the holiday traditions, including matzah, gefilte fish, potato pancake mix, macaroons, wine, jam, juice, candles and a Haggadah, as well as non-perishable food for meals throughout the week.

Along with their box, each family is given a Chai kosher frozen chicken.

Recipients include recent immigrants, the disadvantaged, seniors, shut-ins, students living away from home, women in shelters and others who are referred by social service agencies, clergy, doctors and educators.

"We're missing a pocket, though, of unaffiliated Jews who are desperately in need. We're trying to find them, but we depend on people to give us their names. We're asking people to call Council House if they know of families or [individuals] who genuinely need a box and wouldn't otherwise be able to celebrate the holiday," Mostyn says.

Food donations – items must be kosher for Passover and bought this season – can be dropped off at about 20 stores, as well as at synagogues and schools.

NCJW's list of most needed items includes matzah, oil, wine, gefilte fish, tuna, soup, side dishes, coffee, tea, canned fruit, grape juice, matzah and cake meal, jam, honey and packaged desserts

"When you go shopping, pick up a few extra items and drop them in the box," Mostyn suggests.

The food is definitely appreciated, says Frisch, but cash donations are always welcome because they can then buy food items wholesale. "Food donations meet only about 20 per cent of the food we need."

School groups are booked throughout the drive, which started on March 20, to help prepare and pack boxes, and volunteers are also needed on delivery day, Sunday, April 9, to help deliver the boxes.

"Volunteers can just show up at 9 a.m. on delivery day, and if possible, we ask that they bring a dolly. Students who would like to help fill the cars are asked to call ahead. All students who help out will get community service hours," Frisch says.

All the effort becomes worthwhile, Mostyn says, when they receive thank-you messages from the recipients. "They are overwhelmed by the community's generosity. These are people who often feel lost in society. To receive a gift [such as this] means a lot."

Pesach is not really so different for the cook

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

I have seen experienced and capable cooks go into a complete panic when it comes to Passover. It is as if they had never stepped into a kitchen before and are totally clueless about what and how to cook.

It's really quite simple. Once you've learned the basics, i.e., what not to eat on Passover, and then become familiar with standard substitutions, it becomes very easy – simply a matter of adaptation. If you look at the Passover cookbooks on the market, you will notice that most of these recipes are standards, made year round, with just a tweak here and there to make them Passover-friendly.

We don't have to be seduced by and dependant upon commercialized fast-food products in order to enjoy the holiday. Passover celebrates our freedom from slavery, and it should not be viewed as slavery for the family cook. It is also just one week of the year, albeit an important one.

It is not necessary to go crazy hunting for a jar of kosher l'Pesach Chinese duck sauce! There are a lot of delicious cooking possibilities if you use ordinary, fresh ingredients. In truth, it is through our caring and creativity that we transform ordinary ingredients into extraordinary food. The holiday then provides the inspirational spice.

Marion Siner Gordon's Coconut Cake with Apricot as seen in The New York Times Passover Cookbook, edited by Linda Amster.

SAUTEED MATZAH BALLS

This is a great way to use up leftover matzah balls. There are no specific amounts to this dish. Just make extra matzah balls according to your favourite recipe. Saute "tons" of sliced onions in oil. When onions are golden brown, add matzah balls and continue cooking until they are heated through and lightly golden.

LEMONY CHICKEN BREASTS

From Passover Cookery by Joan Kekst, this is a lovely light dish.

8-10 boneless, skinless chicken breast halves (2½ lb.)
juice of 1 lemon
3 garlic cloves, minced
½ cup olive oil
2 egg whites, lightly beaten
6 tbsp. matzah cake meal, seasoned with salt, pepper and ¼ tsp. ginger

Pound heavy ends of breasts between sheets of wax paper to cook evenly. Drizzle lemon juice and scatter half the garlic pieces over breasts and turn them to marinate for 20 minutes.

Dip chicken in egg whites and lightly coat in matzah cake meal mixture. Heat 2 tbsp. oil in an 11-in. sauté pan on medium high. Saute breasts quickly, 4 minutes per side. Saute in batches adding oil as needed. Place chicken breasts in a shallow, ovenproof casserole. Set aside. May be prepared in advance up to this point.

Preheat oven to 350. Thoroughly heat chicken breasts in the oven for 15-20 minutes. Serves 8.

Lemony Sauce
1 cup mushrooms, sliced juice and grated zest of 1 lemon
1 tbsp. sugar
1 cup rich chicken stock
1 tsp. potato starch mixed with 3 tbsp. chicken stock
3 scallions, thinly sliced
¼ cup pimiento stuffed green olives

To prepare sauce, sprinkle mushrooms with a bit of lemon juice. Combine sugar, remaining lemon juice, broth and potato starch with lemon zest in a medium saucepan. Bring to a simmer, stirring constantly for 3 minutes. Add mushrooms, cook 3 minutes, adjust flavour and consistency with a bit more chicken stock if needed.

Coat chicken breasts thoroughly, and sprinkle scallions and olives over the chicken breasts.

Preheat oven. Heat chicken 15-20 minutes and serve with sauce.

PASSOVER NUT TORTE

This is a moist, delicious cake that is delicious all year round, but a wonderful treat for Passover.

9 eggs, separated (room temperature)
1½ cups sugar
1 tsp. vanilla
10½ ounces hazelnuts, unsalted, unpeeled, finely ground

Preheat oven to 350. In a large mixing bowl, beat egg yolks for 1 minute. Add sugar and vanilla and continue beating until thick and lemon coloured. Add ⅔ of the nuts and beat until combined. In another mixing bowl, beat egg whites until stiff. Fold them into the yolk mixture, gently but thoroughly. Fold in the rest of the nuts and pour into a well-greased 10-inch tube pan.

Bake for about 1 hour, until the cake springs back when lightly touched. Cool in the pan completely upside down. Make sure the cake is done or it will fall out of the pan!

Note: The cake can be iced with lemon icing if desired, but it is delicious as is. Makes 16 servings.

Lemon Icing
5½ oz. unsalted butter or margarine, softened
2 cups powdered sugar, sifted
1½ tbsp. lemon juice
1½ tsp. grated lemon rind

Combine the ingredients thoroughly in a medium sized bowl. Let the bowl sit over hot water for 15 minutes, stirring occasionally, before spreading on cake.

Desserts for special occasions

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

While I'm a proponent of simple desserts not only at the seders but also for chol hamoed, I inevitably get requests from readers for whom a birthday or anniversary or special event falls within the week of Passover.

When I have to make a special dessert during Pesach, the sweet of choice has got to be something as special and unique.

The following recipes are some that I've collected over the years, and are all wonderful.

YAM PUDDING

3-4 large yams
¼ cup fresh-squeezed orange juice
1 tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. nutmeg
slices of blood oranges (or other citrus fruit) for garnish

Individually wrap yams in heavy duty aluminum foil and bake at 350 for 3 hours. This will caramelize the pulp giving it a smooth, sweet flavour.

Cool yams overnight in refrigerator. Remove foil and yam skins (they should fall off) and put pulp in food processor. Add juice, cinnamon and nutmeg to food processor and blend for 8-10 minutes until pudding is light and fluffy.

Chill and serve in individual dessert dishes garnished with fruit. Serves 4.

HONEY PECAN CAKE

1¼ cups honey, divided
1 cup chopped toasted pecans
½ cup dried cranberries or other dried fruit
½ cup semi-sweet chocolate chips
2 tbsp. unsweetened cocoa powder
6 eggs, separated
¼ cup matzah meal
6 tbsp. potato starch
½ tsp. salt

Preheat oven to 325. In a medium bowl, mix together ½ cup honey, pecans, dried fruit, chocolate chips and cocoa powder.

In a separate bowl, combine remaining ¼ cup honey, egg yolks, matzah meal, potato starch and salt.

In a small bowl, beat egg whites until soft peaks form. Fold ¼ of whites into egg yolk mixture. Mix egg yolk mixture back into remaining egg whites.

Spread ½ of batter in greased 9-in. spring form pan. Spoon half of pecan mixture on top. Repeat with remaining batter and pecan mixture. With spoon, gently swirl filling into batter. Bake for 45 minutes, or until cake starts to pull from sides of pan and toothpick inserted near centre comes out clean. Cool 10 minutes; remove cake from pan and cool on wire rack. Serve warm or at room temperature. Makes 8 servings.

CHARLOTTE'S STRAWBERRY RASPBERRY AND RHUBARB CRISP

When buying rhubarb, look for bright red stalks because they are sweeter. They don't even need to be peeled, just sliced. Or, if you prefer, you can substitute frozen rhubarb.

2 cups fresh or frozen rhubarb (about 12 oz.); if fresh, trim ends and slice into ½ in. pieces; if frozen, do not defrost

PASSOVER 2006

Some different sweets to try

1 cup (½ pint) fresh or frozen raspberries, not defrosted
2 cups (about 10 oz.) fresh strawberries, cored and halved or quartered, if large
1½ cups sugar
3 tbsp. packed potato starch regular or nondairy whipped cream or ice cream for serving (optional)

Crumb Topping
¾ cup matzah meal
20 soft coconut or almond macaroons, crumbled with fingers (about 1 cup packed)
4 tbsp. margarine or butter, melted

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 9-in. square baking dish. In a medium bowl, gently stir together rhubarb, raspberries, strawberries, sugar and potato starch. Set the mixture aside while you make the topping.

In a medium bowl, stir together matzah meal, macaroons and melted margarine. Stir fruit to distribute potato starch and sugar, and pour into prepared baking dish. Sprinkle topping over fruit.

Bake for 40 to 45 minutes, or until fruit is tender when pierced with a toothpick and sauce is thick and bubbling. Cool at least 30 minutes before serving.

Crisp may be baked up to 8 hours before serving. Serve warm or at room temperature. If desired, serve with ice cream or whipped cream or pareve topping. Serves 8.

PESACH APPLE SQUARES

½ tsp. salt
½ cup peanut oil
1 cup matzah meal
juice and grated rind of 1 lemon
3 eggs separated, whites beaten stiffly
2 large apples, pared and sliced
1 cup mixed sugar and cinnamon

Preheat oven to 375. In a bowl, combine the sugar-cinnamon mixture, salt and matzah meal. Add the egg yolks, oil and juice and grated rind of lemon and mix well together. Fold in stiffly beaten egg whites. Pour half of this batter into a greased 8x8-in. pan. Cover batter with thinly sliced apples. Sprinkle with remaining batter. Bake for 45 minutes in 375 oven. Cool completely before cutting into squares.

LEMON CHIFFON CAKE WITH STRAWBERRY SAUCE

From Let My People Eat!

1 (9-oz.) box Passover angel food cake mix
1 cup water
¼ cup sugar
¼ cup vegetable oil
3 large eggs
½ tsp. vanilla extract or 1 packet vanilla sugar
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
zest of 1 lemon grated
1½ tsp. matzah meal

Sauce
1 (8-oz.) jar strawberry preserves
1 tbsp. potato starch
2 tbsp. dry red wine
½ cup pineapple preserves
½ pint fresh strawberries, thinly sliced
1 cup toasted almonds, chopped, for garnish (optional)

Preheat oven to 350. From cake mix, empty bag containing the powdered egg whites into a large mixing bowl. Add water and mix on low until egg whites are dissolved, and then slowly increase the speed. When soft peaks begin to form, slowly add the sugar, a little at a time. Beat on high 1-2 minutes or until soft peaks form and then set aside.

In another large bowl, beat oil and eggs 1-2 minutes until mixed and light in colour. Add vanilla, lemon juice and zest and mix well. To the oil and egg mixture, add second bag from cake mix along with matzah cake meal. Mix on low until blended. Fold into beaten egg whites. Pour into ungreased angel food cake pan or 9-in. tube pan. Bake 35 minutes. Remove from oven and allow to cool completely before removing the cake. Serve with the sauce of your choice. Serves 10 to 12.

Sauce: Place strawberry preserves in a small saucepan. In small bowl, mix together the potato starch and wine, then add to the preserves. Heat on medium-high until it begins to boil. Reduce to low and stir until thickened.

Remove from heat. Fold in the pineapple preserves and strawberries. Pour some over the cake or cake slices, sprinkling with almonds. Makes 2 cups of sauce.

Remembering Passover in India

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Diana Mingail's mouth waters as she describes halek, a date syrup used throughout Passover in her native Calcutta, India, which she left in 1954 with her husband and small children.

"It was used as our charoset, but we ate it all week. We would dampen a piece of matzah, add lots and lots of walnuts to the halek, and wrap the matzah around it. What a treat."

The weeks leading up to Passover were exciting, she says. "The whole house was in an uproar. My mother would clean every nook and cranny, and throw out a lot. We had to defend our possessions.

"All the children would begin practising their Haggadah reading at least a month before Passover. We took great pride in it," says Mingail, whose parents were born in Baghdad.

She says she can still see the festive seder table laden with food. "We didn't have particular seder food – meals were always prepared by a cook – because we ate the same festive food we had for Shabbat, but one of my favourites was aloo makullo, whole potatoes that were parboiled and then deep fried until the outsides were crusty and golden and the insides were soft. They were the most delicious things we ate all year."

Rice was eaten at every meal, she says, throughout the year and during Passover. The rice was made with or without vegetables and was often served with chicken spiced with lots of chilies, turmeric, ginger and garlic. "We would buy the turmeric in root form, and the cook would make a paste out of it for every meal.

"We also had khutta, sweet and sour okra or beets."

Cake was unheard of during Passover, says Mingail. "When guests came, we would pull out nuts and raisins. People were always visiting back and forth. We remained in a festive mood all week."

Ruby Ezekiel, who was also born in Calcutta, says her ancestors were from Iraq, but she is a third-generation Indian.

"Our seders were simple. My father and my cousins would make the wine… but just enough for the Kiddush," says Ezekiel, who has been here since 1958.

At any festive meal in India, Ezekiel says, there was no such thing as a main course. "We would put everything on the table except the soup, which was served first.

"Because there was no oven, we would stew the chicken like a pot roast. I remember going to the market with my father to buy a fresh chicken and watching it be slaughtered and feathered."

Like Mingail, she says her family had no particular seder food. "We made what we fancied. If we had a meatball curry, it would be served with plain rice. If we had a vegetable dish, the rice would be prepared with raisins and almonds. Fish and meat were never served at the same meal.

"Dessert was usually fresh fruit such as mangoes and oranges, and dried fruits such as dates and figs."

Cook the extracted juice over high heat until it comes to the boil. Turn down to medium-high, and as it starts to thicken, lower heat to medium. Stir from time to time, but not constantly. If a thick white froth/foam forms on top in the early stages, skim it off. But do not skim constantly, as it will skim off the thickening process. It is the right consistency when a few drops in cold water will form a soft ball.

When thickened, remove from heat. Cool and store in refrigerator. Will keep for a couple of months.

Fill a bowl with halek and mix with a generous amount of ground walnuts.

GADJAR MEETHA

Stewed chicken and carrots

Meetha indicates a dish lightly seasoned with lemon and a bit of sugar for contrast sweet and sour. This basic recipe is the most popular meetha preparation – chicken and carrots.

2 cups shredded carrots
2 tbsp. + 2 tsp. oil
1 tsp. crushed garlic
1 tsp. crushed fresh gingerroot
¼ cup sliced onion
1 tsp. ground turmeric
1 tsp. salt, or to taste
⅛ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
1 chicken, 3 lb., cut into serving pieces, including the giblets
1 cup water
2 bay leaves
4 cardamom pods
2 to 3 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tsp. brown sugar

Stir-fry the carrots in the 2 tsp. oil in a skillet over moderate heat for 3 minutes. Remove skillet from the heat and set aside.

Heat 2 tbsp. of oil in a large pan over moderate heat. Add the garlic, gingerroot, onion, turmeric, salt and black pepper. Stir-fry for 2 minutes. Add the chicken and brown the pieces for 3 minutes.

Add the water, bay leaves and cardamom, bring to a boil and cover pan. Cook the chicken until nearly done, about 20 minutes.

Add the carrots, lemon juice and brown sugar. Stir the mixture and continue to cook over moderate to low heat for 15 minutes more to combine the flavouring and almost completely evaporate the liquid. At this stage, adjust the lemon, sugar and salt if you wish more intense flavour. Serves 6.

MAHMOOSA

Potato Fry and Eggs

2 tbsp. oil
¼ cup thin-sliced onion
1½ cups julienne pieces of potato
½ tsp. ground turmeric
½ tsp. salt or to taste
4 eggs beaten
1 tbsp. chopped fresh coriander
2 scallions, sliced thin

Heat oil in skillet and brown onion over moderate heat for 2 minutes. Add the potatoes, turmeric, salt and stir well. Cover the pan and cook for 3 minutes to soften the potatoes. Uncover and fry for 3 minutes longer to brown them.

Add the eggs, coriander and scallions and stir the mixture well to distribute the eggs. Cover the pan and continue to fry for 5 to 10 minutes to ensure the potatoes are cooked. Uncover and stir-fry until the mixture is dry and soft.

Spinach variation:

Steam ½ lb. spinach in ½ cup water over high heat for 3 minutes to wilt and partially cook the spinach. Drain well, cool enough to handle, and squeeze the spinach dry. Chop it into coarse pieces.

Cut enough potatoes into ¼-in. dice to make 1½ cups. Prepare the mixture by adding the potatoes to the onion and cooking for the same length of time.

Add and stir-fry the spinach. Add the balance of the ingredients. To intensify the flavour, you may increase the salt, corian-

Passover Food Ideas

Jewish Food List: a source of information on kosher food

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Time was, when planning my Passover menu, I'd pore over cookbooks and magazines, wade through those yellowing newspaper clippings that I swear I'm going to file some day, or just call Aunt Sally. But these days, with the click of a mouse, I can lean over a virtual back fence and schmooze with 1,900 Internet neighbours from New Zealand to Kalamazoo to exchange recipes and customs or solve culinary crises.

"We're now five generations or so from the great immigrations," says Brian Mailman (his real name), owner and moderator of the Jewish Food List, established in 1996 as an international e-mail community. Members from 45 countries, including Israel, Canada, South Africa, Australia, Iceland and Japan, focus on Jewish food, cooking history and traditions.

"A lot of knowledge is getting lost by assimilation and attenuation," notes Mailman, who was classically trained in French cuisine and writes the column "I Can't Believe It's Kosher" for www.ujc.org. "The younger folk wanting to 'return' are tutored by the empty-nesters who are eager to share, kids asking the village elders some of the basic how-to's and how much's."

"The Jewish Food List connects me to cooks from all over the world," says CJN's Norene Gilletz. "If I have a culinary question when researching ingredients or recipes, I know someone on the list will respond. It's a true community, and the many wonderful friends I have made over the years, some of whom I've met in person, have definitely influenced the way I write cookbooks today."

A typical request: "At my dentist's today I picked up an old Gourmet magazine, but the Passover recipe for Porcini Matzo Polenta Wedges was ripped out," Eliane Driessen of Amsterdam writes. "Does anyone have it?" Within hours Nancy Berry of San Francisco and Maxine Wolfson of Rhode Island have posted it.

Moderators Wendy Baker, (New York), Sharon Kuritzky (Buffalo) and Maxine Wolfson (Rhode Island) assist Mailman as the 10 to 12,000 e-mails are posted each year, but even non-members can browse the 5,300 or so recipes (about 2,000 for Passover), archived by members Naomi Horowitz (Chicago), Shayla Gunter-Goldstein (Toronto), Annice Grinberg (Israel), Liliana Wajnberg (Brazil) and Hindy Gershman (New York.)

Besides recipes and cooking tips, the daily e-mails awaken forgotten food fantasies. Dalia Carmel of Manhattan, who owns over 5,000 cookbooks, remembers growing up in Israel when eggs were rationed to five per week for their family of three. "As a result, my mother and I dreamt of the day that we could eat as many eggs as we wanted. In 1951, we were invited to a seder by relatives who raised chickens. On the table was a large bowl filled with peeled hard-boiled eggs. I managed to consume nine!"

Members may discuss unconventional choices for the seder plate. Vegetarians take note! Michele Wolgel Rose of Chicago substitutes an avocado pit for the roasted egg, and Sue Honeyman of Connecticut replaces the shank bone with a roasted beet. Francine Weistrop of Massachusetts uses ginger for the bitter herbs.

"A potato was often used by eastern European Jews for karpas because of the absence of green vegetables at Passover," notes Wendy Baker of Upstate New York, one of our resident authorities on all things kosher.

"My father's family always used potato," Lori Cahan-Simon of Cleveland agrees, "but added parsley as karpas in the new country, so we have, in effect, parsley potatoes!"

And why an orange on the seder plate of late? A widely circulated myth has it that Dr. Susannah Heschel once addressed a convocation of Orthodox rabbis, one of whom commented, "A woman belongs on the bimah like an orange belongs on the seder plate."

Actually, Heschel began the tradition as a gesture of solidarity with gays and lesbians. "It does lead to lively discussions both from the enthusiastic feminists and the skeptical traditionalists," says Malkie Altman of Long Island.

"Among those who attend our seders are people from a variety of traditions," adds Lorri Lewis of Palo Alto, Calif. "Unexpected foods on the table help create interest among the guests," prompting Mailman to comment, "These many symbols on the seder plate sound like the list itself, all traditions on one plate!"

Challenge breeds creativity, and at no time of year is the challenge to create delicious meals greater than at Passover. And if Passover is a challenge, then creating Passover desserts is the decathlon. As the recipes pour in, Leslie Hoddeson of Scarsdale, N.Y., wails: "All these desserts are making me fat! They sound so delicious, I want to make them all!"

KURDISH CHAROSET (HALIK)

- cup pistachio nuts
- cup walnuts
- cup almonds
- cup sultana raisins
- cup dark raisins
- cup dates
- 2 apples, peeled
- tsp. cinnamon
- cup fresh pomegranate juice

Grind the nuts coarsely together in a food processor. Add dry fruit and blend to a paste texture. Grate apples and add to mixture. Stir in cinnamon and pomegranate juice. Mix well. The paste should be sweet, tart and crunchy. Makes about 4 cups.

CHOCOLATE MOUSSE HAZELNUT CAKE

For the cake:
matzah cake meal (for pan)
3 oz. hazelnuts, toasted and ground, 1 cup cup matzah cake meal
2 tbsp. potato starch
¼ tsp. cinnamon
8 egg yolks, room temperature
cup sugar
2 tsp. vanilla, optional
4 egg whites, room temperature
⅛ tsp. salt
⅓ cup sugar

For the mousse:
8 oz. semisweet chocolate
¼ cup strong freshly brewed coffee
4 eggs, separated, room temperature
1 tbsp. Passover brandy or rum
2 tbsp. sugar
shaved semisweet chocolate

Preheat oven to 400. Grease bottom of 10-in. springform pan. Dust with cake meal, shaking off excess. To make cake, combine hazelnuts, ½ cup cake meal, potato starch and cinnamon in small bowl.

Using electric mixer, beat yolks and ½ cup sugar until slowly dissolving ribbon forms when beaters are lifted. Blend in vanilla if desired. Using clean, dry beaters, beat whites and salt in another bowl until soft peaks form. Gradually add ⅓ cup sugar and beat until stiff but not dry. Gently fold ⅓ of whites into yolk mixture to lighten. Fold mixture back into whites. Sprinkle with hazelnut mixture and fold gently.

Turn batter into prepared pan, spreading evenly. Bake until top is brown and tester inserted in centre comes out clean, about 20 minutes. Cool cake completely in pan; cake will deflate.

To make mousse, melt chocolate with coffee in double boiler over gently simmering water; stir until smooth. Let cool.

Beat yolks into chocolate mixture 1 at a time. Blend in brandy. Beat whites until soft peaks form. Gradually add sugar and heat until stiff but not dry. Gently fold whites into chocolate mixture. Spread mousse onto cake. Cover and refrigerate until mousse is firm, several hours or overnight.

Just before serving, remove springform from cake. Sprinkle top with chocolate. Makes 12 servings.

BAKED PEARS AND GRAPES

1½ to 2 cups Muscat wine
½ cup sugar
2 tbsp. honey
½ cup orange marmalade
½ vanilla bean, cut in half lengthwise, seeds scraped out and reserved
6 ripe pears, peeled, cut in half lengthwise, cored
1 lemon, cut in half
1 bunch red seedless grapes
Ice cream for serving

Preheat oven to 375. Pour wine into 9-in. square baking dish if pears are small. (If pears are large, you will need larger baking dish.) Add sugar, honey, marmalade and vanilla bean (both seeds and pod).

Rub pears with cut lemon to prevent discoloration. Place pears in baking dish, cut side down. Add grapes between pears. Spoon wine mixture over pears. Bake, uncovered, 40 minutes. Serve warm topped with ice cream, if desired. Makes 6 servings.

Satisfying your sweet tooth at Passover

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

At Passover, there's certainly no paucity of packaged treats and cake mixes lining the grocery store shelves. However, with a little ingenuity and whimsy, you can come up with several sweet tooth satisfiers all on your own.

Many of your regular recipes can be changed over for Passover by following a simple formula. For every 1 cup of all-purpose flour, subsitute 1/4 cup matzah cake meal and 1/4 cup potato starch. If the recipe only calls for 1/2 cup of all-purpose flour, substitute 2 tbsp. of matzah cake meal and 6 tbsp. (or 1/3 cup) potato starch. Of course, the texture will be a bit different, but I'm confident, you'll be pleased with the results. Kosher for Passover baking powder (found in most packaged goods) contains no cornstarch and is hence allowed at Passover. Also, try to use a medium ground matzah cake meal, rather than a fine one, since it tends to result in a moister product.

KILLER DOUBLE CHOCOLATE COOKIES

1 cup granulated sugar
4 eggs
1 tsp. kosher for Passover vanilla
1 lb. bittersweet chocolate, melted and cooled
1/3 cup potato starch
2 tbsp. matzah cake meal
1/4 tsp. kosher for Passover baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
1 lb. white chocolate, coarsely chopped

In bowl, using electric mixer, beat eggs with sugar and vanilla until pale yellow, about five minutes. Fold in melted chocolate until completely smooth.

In separate bowl, combine potato starch, matzah cake meal, baking powder and salt. Using wooden spoon, stir into chocolate mixture. Stir in white chocolate.

Drop tablespoonfuls of batter, about 2 in. apart, on parchment paper-lined baking sheets.

Bake in centre of preheated 325 oven for 12 to 14 minutes or until set at edges but still soft in the centre – do not overbake. Cool on pan on rack for 3 minutes. Transfer cookies to wire rack to cool completely. (Cookies can be stored at room temperature in airtight container for up to 5 days). Makes about 5 dozen cookies.

Variation: Dissolve 2 tsp. of espresso powder in vanilla, stirring until smooth. Proceed as recipe directs.

ROASTED PINEAPPLE WITH CARAMEL SAUCE

1 large ripe pineapple
2 tbsp. margarine or unsalted butter, melted
2 tbsp. pineapple or pear juice
1/3 cup packed brown sugar

Caramel Sauce:
1 1/2 cups granulated sugar
1/2 cup water
2 tbsp. margarine or unsalted butter
1 cup whipping cream or non dairy liquid cream substitute

In heavy large saucepan set over medium low heat, combine sugar with 1/2 cup water, stirring until sugar is dissolved. Increase heat to medium and let boil, without stirring but brushing down sides of pan often with wet brush, until mixture is a deep amber colour, about 12 minutes. Remove from heat. Whisk in margarine. Averting face, pour in cream or cream substitute. Return to pan to heat and stir over low heat until smooth. Let cool slightly and use immediately or cover and refrigerate for up to two days. Rewarm gently before using.

Pineapple: Peel pineapple; quarter lengthwise and remove core. Slice each quarter lengthwise into 4 strips. Arrange pineapple strips on parchment paper-lined baking sheets.

In bowl, stir together butter and juice; brush half over pineapple slices. Sprinkle with half of the sugar.

Roast in centre of preheated 400 degree oven for 10 minutes. Turn all slices over; brush with remaining butter mixture and sprinkle with remaining sugar. Roast for 15 to 20 minutes or until pineapple is golden. Let cool slightly on pan.

Cut each slice into thirds and serve with caramel sauce. Makes 8 to 10 servings.

Roasted pineapple is also terrific served over sorbets, cakes or even yogurt.

WHITE CHOCOLATE AND FRUIT FUDGE

1 1/2 lb. white chocolate, coarsely chopped
1 can sweetened condensed milk
1 tsp. vanilla
1/3 cup chopped dried apricots
1/3 cup dried cranberries
1/4 cup chopped walnuts

In heavy-bottomed saucepan, melt white chocolate with sweetened condensed milk, stirring often to keep smooth. Remove from heat. Stir again if any butterfats have been released. Stir in vanilla, apricots, cranberries and walnuts.

Spread mixture evenly in parchment paper-lined 9-inch square pan, with parchment paper extending 2 inches over 2 sides. Cover with plastic wrap. Refrigerate for at least 2 hours or for up to 5 days.

To serve, lift the fudge out of the pan by pulling on the excess parchment paper. Cut into squares. Makes 6 dozen pieces.

CINNAMON ALMOND MACAROONS

1 1/2 cups sliced almonds (about 5 oz)
2 cups granulated sugar
2 tbsp. packed light brown sugar
1/4 tsp. ground cinnamon
3 egg whites

In bowl of food processor, finely grind together almonds, 1 1/4 cups of granulated sugar, brown sugar and cinnamon. Transfer to bowl.

In separate bowl using electric mixer, beat egg whites until soft peaks form. Gradually add remaining granulated sugar; beat until stiff and glossy peaks form. Fold one-third of almond mixture into meringue; fold in remaining nut mixture.

Using pastry bag fitted with a 1/2-in. tip or small wet spoon, pipe batter onto parchment paper lined baking sheets in 1-in. rounds.

Bake in centre of preheated 350 degree oven for 10 to 12 minutes or until cookies are golden brown. Cool on pan on rack for 2 minutes. Transfer macaroons to wire racks to cool completely. (Cookies can be stored at room temperature in airtight container for up to 7 days.) Makes about 5 1/2 dozen.

Pesach tips for diabetics

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Meals on Pesach don't have to be limited to "potatoes, potatoes and more potatoes," says registered dietitian Serena Beber, a diabetes educator at Toronto's East General Hospital.

Beber was speaking at the March meeting of the Jewish diabetes chapter of the Canadian Diabetes Association, held at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

The key, she said, especially for diabetics, is to think and plan ahead, so that you can control your blood sugar.

While noting that "Pesach is only eight days – it's not the end of the world if blood sugar is a little bit higher than usual," nevertheless you still have to be careful to balance diet, exercise and medication, she said.

Most people think of the Pesach diet as raising blood sugar levels, Beber said. However, some medications, especially insulin and glyburide, actually lower blood sugar, which can be just as serious as high levels. Together with erratic mealtimes and less time for regular exercise, people can wind up in severe straits.

This is especially true for the first seder, when we tend to eat very late, meals tend to be high in carbohydrates, and we must drink the wine and eat the matzah to conform to rabbinic and talmudic injunctions.

"It may well be necessary to adjust your medication, but talk to your doctor – don't make these decisions on your own."

Foods at the seder tend to be full of "matzah, matzah meal and farfel," Beber said. Also, many families use potatoes for the karpas part of the seder, when vegetables are dipped in salt water (others use celery, which has no carbs at all).

Contrary to popular belief, Beber said, wine, or alcohol generally, doesn't necessarily raise blood sugar levels – it can lower them instead. "Wine stops the liver from making the sugar it needs, leading to low blood sugar. Make sure to have a snack in the afternoon to counteract this effect."

Wine can be diluted to half strength, so long as it still tastes like wine, Beber said, or one can drink dry wine, which has a very low sugar content. It is especially important to dilute the first cup of wine, she warned, since you are drinking it on an empty stomach. Just to further complicate matters, blood sugar tends to be higher at bedtime, and you may need more insulin then. "Again, speak to your doctor."

She also suggested that you test your blood sugar at bedtime – you may need a snack.

At the seder, she pointed out, "you don't need to eat everything on the menu."

Diabetics can enjoy Passover

In response to a question from the audience, Beber recommended eating foods with a low glycemic index rating (the glycemic index ranks carbohydrate foods by how much they raise or lower blood sugar). Choose whole wheat matzah, for instance.

The latest Canadian Diabetes Association food diagram shows the ideal plate as consisting of half vegetables and one-quarter each grains and proteins.

"Protein does slow down the increase in blood sugar and keeps you full longer. However, it is hard on the kidneys, which are at risk anyway for those with diabetes."

Eat lots of vegetables, high fibre foods, fruits and seeds, she said, not just at the seder but for all Pesach meals.

Shopping should be planned carefully, Beber said. "You don't have to fill your cart with chips and cookies."

FROZEN STRAWBERRY SOUFFLE

4 cups fresh strawberries; reserve 6 and puree remaining berries in blender or food processor with ½ cup sugar
2 egg whites
2 tbsp. lemon juice
½ cup sugar
a little brandy (optional)

Beat together the egg whites and lemon juice. Gradually add the sugar and brandy, if using it, and beat until stiff peaks form.

Fold berry mixture into egg white mixture. Beat continuously at high speed until double in volume (about 10 minutes). Pour into glass serving bowl, cover and freeze at least 24 hours. Remove from freezer 15 minutes before serving and garnish with reserved berries. Makes 20 servings.

One serving of ½ cup has 50 calories, 0.5 g. protein, 0.1 g fat, 12 g carbohydrate.

PASSOVER VEGETABLE MUFFINS

3 tbsp. oil
1 medium onion, chopped
1 garlic clove, crushed
1 green or red pepper, chopped
½ cup celery, chopped
1½ cups carrots, grated
1 cup zucchini, grated, drained
3 eggs, beaten
1 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
½ matzah meal

Preheat oven to 350. Saute onion and garlic in hot oil; add pepper, celery, carrots and zucchini. Cook over medium heat for 10 minutes. Let cool. Add beaten eggs, salt, pepper and matzah meal. Mix until blended. Line muffin tin with 12 baking cups. Spoon mixture into muffin cups. Bake for 45 minutes or until golden.

Each muffin is ½ starchy choice, ½ fruit and vegetable choice, 1 fat and oil choice, 11 g carbohydrate, 3 g protein, 5 g fat and 77 calories.

German baroness to be sued for lost Stern art

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The estate of the late Montreal art dealer Max Stern is about to sue a German aristocrat in Rhode Island for a painting that was among hundreds the Nazis forced Stern to liquidate in Germany some 70 years ago.

Concordia University's Clarence Epstein, who is heading an international quest to locate and return to the estate about 400 art works that Stern lost or had to sell for a small fraction of their value, announced last Friday that legal proceedings will be launched in "the upcoming weeks."

Epstein said the legal route is being taken after discussions with the current owner failed.

Concordia, along with McGill University and the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, are the heirs of the Stern estate. The will stipulates that the universities are also to be the beneficiaries of any reclaimed property. Stern, who died in 1987, and his late wife, Iris, had no children.

The 19th-century oil painting in question is of a reclining woman, by Franz Xavier Winterhalter. It was taken on consignment by Estates Unlimited of Cranston, R.I., from the emigree Baroness Von Morsey Pickard.

According to Estates Unlimited owner Steven Fusco, the baroness told him the painting had hung in her father's home in Germany for many years.

Fusco is quoted in the Warwick Beacon as saying: "She had all the receipts and paperwork and it appeared as if it was like any other consignment." He expected the work to sell for between $50,000 and $75,000 US. Winterhalter, a German, was a popular portraitist among the European nobility.

Epstein contacted Fusco after the painting was posted for sale on eBay.

The painting, titled Girl from the Sabiner Mountain, is listed by the Art Loss Registry in London as confiscated, Epstein said. Documentation shows that the Winterhalter painting was included in a Lempertz auction house catalogue in Germany in 1937 and was sold to the baroness's father for $3,600.

According to the Beacon, the baroness's lawyer is arguing that Baron Von Morsey paid fair market value for the painting and that Stern most likely received at least part of the proceeds. The baroness inherited the work.

When his father, Julius, died in 1934, Max Stern took over the family art gallery in Dusseldorf, one of the most important in Germany. Soon after, the Gestapo informed him that, as a Jew, he was no longer allowed to trade in art. He was ordered to sell off his inventory with the "state-sanctioned" Lempertz auctioneers in Cologne, which is still in business.

The approximately 400 works, which included old masters from Holland and Belgium and 19th-century and contemporary German art, were sold in 1935-37, with "about two to five cents on the dollar" going to Stern himself, Epstein said. What's more, the buyers knew they were picking up huge bargains because it was a Jewish gallery being forced out of business.

Today, he estimated they would be worth "tens of millions of dollars."

The Winterhalter is one of 10 works so far located by Epstein, a cultural property specialist attached to the office of the Concordia president, who launched the search one year ago. Discussions with the current "possessors" of the other nine works, as well as with Christie's and Sotheby's, are "moving forward," he said.

Those responsible for museums and national collections are more sensitive to the issue of Nazi-looted art, but it is more difficult to persuade private collectors, who probably bought the works in good faith, that they have a "moral obligation" to relinquish them, Epstein said. But the fact is these works are now "tainted" and can never be resold on the legitimate market.

They have been found in corporate collections, including a casino, in museums and in private hands, among them the original purchasers or their descendants. They are in Germany, Holland and other countries, including Taiwan.

In total, Epstein has traced more than 40 of the missing works, but not yet located their whereabouts. They include works by European artists such as Jan Brueghel (in the Dutch state collection), Lodovico Carracci, Emile-Vernet Lecomte and Max Liebermann.

Many of the 40 have been offered on the market in the last two decades by the same 15 auction houses, most of them in Germany. Over the next few weeks, these establishments will be asked to co-operate in putting him in contact with the last known owners of these works. A list of all the Stern works in questions is also to be circulated to some members of the art trade and museums throughout Germany.

Epstein noted that, as recently as six months ago, Lempertz was still listing the Stern sale on its website as one of its major undertakings, without any acknowledgement of the circumstances.

Stern, who fled to Britain before World War II, was interned there during the war as an enemy alien and deported to Canada where he continued to be detained for a couple of years. Stern owned the Dominion Gallery on Sherbrooke Street for four decades and became one of the most influential art patrons in the country, playing a major role in the promotion of Canadian artists in particular.

After the war, Stern spent several years trying to recover some of his lost art, but only managed to get back about six or eight works, Epstein said.

Epstein said the executors of the Stern estate intend to pursue the lost art to the full extent of their resources. "Since Dr. Stern's death, the executors have distributed hundreds of works of art and tens of millions of dollars to universities and museums worldwide," he said.

Epstein has been working in collaboration with the New York State Holocaust Claims Processing Office, the National Gallery of Canada and the Art Loss Register.

Next fall, Concordia will launch a travelling exhibition and publication on the forced sale of Stern's property at Lempertz, and will participate in an international lecture series on issues surrounding Nazi looting, forced liquidation and stolen art. The series will be organized in conjunction with the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre.

CRTC OKs Jewish AM radio station for Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Montreal radio station whose slogan is "All Jewish, All the Time" has received approval from the Canadian Radio-television and Telecommunications Commission (CRTC) for a spot on the AM band.

Radio Shalom has been given permission to operate a "commercial religious" station in French (60 per cent), English (30 per cent) and Hebrew (10 per cent) at 1650 kHz with a transmitter power of 1,000 watts, which will enable it to be heard in Greater Montreal, and possibly a little farther at night.

The not-for-profit Radio Shalom, which relies largely on volunteers, has been on the air since 1999. It is currently accessible with a special radio that picks up the subcarrier frequency made available through CIRA-FM 91.3, a local religious station operated by Radio Ville-Marie. For a couple of years, Radio Shalom has also been heard via the Internet.

Radio Shalom's first application for an AM spot was turned down by the CRTC three years ago.

Philippe Régnoux, program director at Radio Shalom, said he expects the station to be on AM by the end of May or early June. It is believed to be the only Jewish radio station of its kind, not just in Canada, but the whole Western Hemisphere.

Before receiving its licence, Radio Shalom must receive the go-ahead from the department of industry that it has met all the technical requirements, but this is considered a formality, Régnoux said. The licence will be valid until Aug. 31, 2012.

Stan Asher, who co-ordinates English programming, said the goal is to create a radio station that will be of interest to the broad spectrum of the Jewish community and even the general public. Although it is designated a religious station, much of its content will more accurately be described as cultural or ethnic in nature.

Asher, who has some 30 years of experience in community radio, is aiming for a lively, varied product.

"This is not just going to be rabbis praying and gloomy news about Israel. There'll be talk shows, phone-in shows, interviews, music, hourly news. It'll sound like a regular radio station, not some propaganda machine. I'd call it the Jewish equivalent of CJAD," he said. Most of the content will be local, live programming, with the rest packaged material available from Israel and elsewhere.

Radio Shalom will stretch the definition of Jewish, to include anything that has some interest to the community. For example, Asher's next interviewee April 3 on his show Montreal Jewish Magazine is Mark Abley, author of Spoken Here: Travels Among Threatened Languages, one of which is Yiddish.

Asher also teams up three times weekly with Pierre Lasry for Montreal Focus: All the News about Jews, during which they gab about any topical issues they fancy.

Asher would like to clear up the perception that Radio Shalom is only for Sephardim or is a service of the Rabbinat Sépharade du Québec. There are some links: the station's founder and president is Robert Levy, who is executive director of the Rabbinat, and its premises are across the street from the Rabbinat's headquarters, but it is not supported by the Rabbinat or any organization.

Régnoux said a board of directors including representatives of major Jewish organizations is being formed to oversee the station.

At present, the station has only two professional staff, Régnoux and Eloise Cohen, an on-air journalist, who came here last year under a cultural exchange program for young people between Quebec and France.

The station has taken the decision to respect Shabbat and Jewish holidays by airing no programming at that time.

That "dead air" has enabled Radio Shalom to comply with one of the CRTC's conditions that it provide "balance" in its religious programming. For 18 hours each week from Friday night to Saturday night, Radio Shalom will make its airwaves available to other religious and ethnic communities, which do not now have access to radio elsewhere. In addition, 15 per cent of the weekly airtime is to be devoted to programs produced by other religious groups.

The groups cited in the CRTC decision are the Communauté Catholique Congolaise de Montréal and the Association socioculturelle bulgare. Other programs to be broadcast on Radio Shalom include La religion au Québec, a review of religious matters, and Sanatan Dharma, which deals with Hinduism.

Régnoux said the content must remain predominantly French because the CRTC wants it to match the makeup of the general population of Montreal, rather than the linguistic reality of the Jewish community.

The CRTC has stipulated that the station air at least 90 hours of local programming per week during the regulated hours from 6 a.m. to midnight. (Radio Shalom is on 24 hours a day.)

Radio Shalom has committed itself to 42 hours of spoken-word programming and at least 11 hours of news and information of a general nature. It also affirmed before the CRTC hearings that providing "differing views on issues and events" will be a "fundamental principle."

There were objections to Radio Shalom's application. The Association québécoise de l'industrie du disque, du spectacle et de la vidéo (ADISQ) was concerned about how serious Radio Shalom is about developing Canadian talent. Radio Shalom has promised to earmark 20 per cent of its annual earnings to encouraging Canadian talent, a total of $35,000 over seven years. It may use this money to organize on-air talent contests.

Régnoux is confident an AM station will reach a much larger audience. Currently, about 7,000 people tune in each day to Radio Shalom on 91.3 FM Sea and the website has an average of 200 to 300 hits daily, he said.

Chamber choir to perform benefit in Owen Sound

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Lachan, the Toronto Jewish Chamber Choir, will perform a benefit concert in Owen Sound, Ont., on April 2 to raise funds to restore and repair Beth Ezekiel, the town's synagogue.

Beth Ezekiel president Jeff Elie said Lachan, a 25-voice ensemble that has performed all over Canada, the United States and Europe, will entertain the audience with a range of Jewish music from 11th-century liturgical pieces to modern and popular Broadway tunes.

Elie said he specifically asked that the choir perform "something light," which he hopes will appeal to a general audience.

"They'll be doing some Broadway melodies and songs from West Side Story, some things from Fiddler on the Roof, Showboat," he said.

While there is a strong Jewish theme, with the first part of the show featuring Yiddish selections, Elie said the performance will be geared toward exposing a non-Jewish audience to Jewish culture.

"There are only about 50 Jews in Owen Sound," he said, explaining why the concert hopes to attract members of the non-Jewish community.

Money raised to help improve the aging shul

"Because our shul is so small, we're having the event at a local church," he said, adding organizers are hoping to fill the 700 seats of Owen Sound's Knox United Church.

The concert will also feature a performance by the Georgian Bay Children's Choir, which will open for Lachan.

Elie said the Beth Ezekiel Synagogue will be open to the public before the concert, and he hopes that will be another opportunity to expose the Owen Sound community to Jewish life and culture.

Elie said that the money raised from the concert will go to improving the aging shul, a former church that was turned into a synagogue after the Jewish community bought it in 1946.

"The shul is in need of repair. This is one way to raise money for the restoration and improvement of the shul," he said, adding that Lachan has been kind enough to perform a benefit, which means it won't be paid for the performance.

He said that although there is a Jewish theme to the concert, he's confident that it will appeal to the entire community.

"I think there will be a positive reaction to this. People in Owen Sound are always eager to learn about the Jewish community and I hope people will come away from this performance with the spirit of friendship and peace."

Job fair aims to keep young Jews in Winnipeg

By REBECA KUROPATWA
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — About 30 Jewish students and new graduates came out this month to an event designed to find jobs for them in Winnipeg so they'll stay and help reverse the decline of the city's Jewish community.

"Good to Go," held March 16 at the Asper Jewish Community Campus, is the first completely youth-oriented program initiative organized by the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's Grow Winnipeg initiative, said the program's placement consultant, Cliff Huot.

"Until now, [Grow Winnipeg's] emphasis has always been on new immigrants and mature people re-entering the workforce. There has not been enough energy put into trying to keep younger people in Winnipeg," Huot said.

Grow Winnipeg was established by the federation about four years ago to increase the size of Winnipeg's Jewish population through greater immigration. It also seeks to encourage former Winnipeggers to move back, and to persuade younger members of the community to stay.

Winnipeg's Jewish population stands at about 15,000, up from 14,765 in 2001, according to the census that year. At the community's height in 1961, some 19,400 Jews lived in the city.

At the "Good to Go" event, organizations, businesses and employment advisors had the opportunity to meet young adults ages 17 to 25 and discuss education, job training, career opportunities, internships and summer employment.

"People say that the community doesn't do enough for them," Huot said. "We want to show them that this is not the case."

Huot said that he "wants to show youth that the grass will not necessarily be any greener when they leave Winnipeg."

He added that there's "a misconception out there that if new graduates move out of Winnipeg, they will have more options. It's not that clear-cut an issue. If youth move away, they might have more opportunities to make more money, but they will also have to spend a whole lot more just to make ends meet."

Huot "wants young Winnipeggers to know that staying in Winnipeg is a solid option for them. Here, there are less pressures, more quality of life, and living expenses are much more affordable. Elsewhere, there is a boom or bust economy."

Participants and business representatives alike were positive about "Good to Go," saying they'd be interested in attending more such events, Huot said.

A wide variety of participating businesses and government organizations set up display tables, including Great West Life, the City of Winnipeg, the Winnipeg Regional Health Authority and the Manitoba Civil Service Commission.

Montreal police giving hate crime high priority

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Two years after making a commitment to better deal with hate-motivated crime, the Montreal police department says the system now in place is working and incidents have declined significantly.

At a media conference held during Action Week Against Racism last week, Inspector Yves Riopel said such crimes, whether against a person or property, are given high priority and handled by teams specialized in this area.

Unlike most other large Canadian cities, Montreal does not have a hate-crimes unit. Immediately after the firebombing of United Talmud Torahs in April 2004, Jewish community leaders urged the city administration to create such a unit. Following the leaders' meeting with Mayor Gerald Tremblay, then-police chief Michel Sarrazin and other city officials, Peter Yeomans, who was then the executive committee member in charge of public security, announced that there would be a "clarification" within the force on the handling of hate-motivated crimes and more serious attention given to even relatively minor incidents.

Last year, the department put into place a protocol to be followed when an apparently hate-motivated crime occurs, Riopel said. At the same time, the system is flexible enough to be adapted according to the circumstances, he added

The officers first responding to an incident or complaint are required to determine whether it involves hatred or discrimination based on race, ethnicity, religion or other categories protected by the human rights charter.

Their report is then reviewed by the immediate supervisor and the sergeant-detective at the local station, who can agree with or overrule the report's conclusion, or ask for further information about the incident, Riopel said.

If deemed a hate-motivated crime at this stage, the matter is directed to the department's operational centre where two investigative units, one dealing with crimes against persons and the other with crimes against property, take over the case, but only if there is an arrest at the scene, or a witness or physical evidence.

Each of these units consists of a lieutenant-detective, two sergeant-detectives and an analyst.

While they do not work exclusively on hate-motivated crime, Riopel said it is the same people always handling such cases. What's more, he added, they place such crimes "at the top of the files." For example, if a swastika is painted on a synagogue, it gets attention before other types of graffiti, he said.

When there are no arrests or leads, the case goes directly to the organized-crime unit, or anti-gang squad as it is better known, to which Riopel is attached. More serious incidents, such as arson, or multiple incidents, like vandalism at several sites, also go straight to the organized-crime unit or other special units such as the arson squad, he said.

Previously, hate crimes investigations were carried out at the local station level.

"While we don't have a hate-crimes unit as such, the procedure we follow is very similar," Riopel said. "The structure we have in place is very adequate, considering the volume we have to treat."

The number of crimes deemed to be motivated by hated has declined a lot in recent years. In 2002, there were 51, in 2003, 38, and in 2004, the most recent statistics available, 18, he said.

Riopel said this trend may be explained by the increase in the number of local stations allowing police to get to better know their neighbourhoods and develop closer ties with the population they serve, as well as greater focus on prevention.

Canada's Criminal Code limits hate crime to propaganda that incites hatred against an identifiable group or advocacy of genocide. Sleiman El-Merhebi, for example, was not charged with a hate crime, although police judged it to be motivated by hate against Jews because of what was written a note left at the scene. Proven hate motivation may result in stiffer sentencing.

During the media conference, assistant police director Yves Charette stressed the department's desire to have more dialogue with minorities and to sensitize its personnel to the city's cultural diversity. The department also intends to increase the number of people from ethnic, visible and aboriginal communities on the force.

Protesters urge York U to dump 'Israel lobbyists'

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A rally urging two York University figures to resign over their support of Israel led to a confrontation between pro-Palestinian and pro-Israeli students earlier this month.

Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR), the Arab Students' Collective (ASC) and the Grassroots Anti-Imperialist Network (GRAIN) organized a demonstration March 16 called "Israel Apartheid and York University" to pressure the university to meet a list of demands outlined in a letter delivered to Julia Koschitzky, who sits on the board of directors of the York University Foundation, York's fundraising arm.

Aside from calling on Koschitzky, who also sits on The CJN's board of directors, and York president Lorna Marsden to resign, the student groups also demanded that York cut ties to the Israeli corporate and academic establishments, apologize to students for calling Toronto police to remove students from a January 2005 rally, and apologize to Prof. David Noble, who is suing the university for $10 million for saying he made anti-Semitic allegations about the foundation, York's campus newspaper Excalibur reported.

In 2004, Noble distributed flyers at a pro-Palestinian rally that said the foundation was being run by staunch pro-Israel lobbyists.

The March 16 rally was held to mark the death of Rachel Corrie, an American student and member of the International Solidarity Movement who died in 2003 when she was accidentally crushed by an Israel Defence Forces bulldozer that was demolishing a Palestinian home in the West Bank.

When Adam Hummel, president of Hillel at York, heard of the planned demonstration, he and Hillel's Israel affairs committee decided to gather people from various campus groups to promote a different image of Israel.

"I knew the rally would be about Israeli Apartheid Week [held last month at the University of Toronto, and] about the 'Jewish connection' at York," Hummel said, adding that Ahmed Habib, the York Federation of Students vice-president of equity and services, spoke to the protesters about the plight of the Palestinians and urged the crowd to support the intifadah.

Habib did not return calls for comment.

Hummel said that while protesters were chanting phrases such as, "From Iraq to Palestine, occupation is a crime," and put up signs that read "Globalize the Intifadah," the supporters of Israel were dancing the horah, singing Hatikvah (Israel's national anthem), and trying to promote a message of peace.

"There was lots of shouting back and forth," Hummel said, guessing that about 200 people gathered in York's Vari Hall rotunda, and supporters of Israel were greatly outnumbered.

"A lot of Jewish students were concerned and offended by what they were seeing," he said.

But, he added, when most of the protesters left on their march to the president's office shouting anti-Israel slogans, the ones who remained took part in productive, encouraging talks.

"When the leaders of the rally weren't there to push people into a certain point of view, people got to hear the other side of the story," Hummel said.

Noble said that although he wasn't involved in organizing this latest rally, he said he did speak to protesters about the "Jewish connection" at York.

He also said he supports the students' request to get rid of both Marsden and Koschitzky.

"Marsden should have been thrown out years ago," Noble said.

"In terms of Koschitzky, I don't think they should stop there. They should get rid of the whole gang. The connection between Israel lobbyists and the York University Foundation is quite unsavoury. They clearly influence what goes on at York."

In another matter, Noble, who is Jewish, has filed a human rights complaint against York in an effort to end its practice of closing down for the Jewish High Holy Days.

York spokesperson Richard Fisher said the university would not respond to the demonstrators' demands.

"We are not going to reply, as the letter was unsigned and undated, so it would be like replying to tract," he said.

"It also had a major error of fact in that Ms. Koschitzky is not employed by the foundation," he added, noting that the letter said she is a foundation employee when in fact she's a volunteer.

Come for the learning. Stay for the fun.

Varsity Jews sing to save a child's heart

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Varsity Jews are planning to sing their way into the hearts of the Jewish community in the hopes of raising enough money to save a child's heart.

A Jewish a cappella group at the University of Toronto affiliated with Hillel of Greater Toronto, the Varsity Jews will be performing at the Holy Blossom Temple on April 2, with all proceeds going to Save a Child's Heart, an organization that provides underprivileged children all over the world with free open-heart surgery.

Avi Shack, 19, a second-year U of T student taking sociology and Jewish studies who has been with the group for two years, said the show, called Big Shtick, "is about spreading people's interest in Jewish music and Judaism and spreading the feeling of friendship and community."

Shack said he knew he wanted to get involved with Hillel from the moment he showed up on campus two years ago.

"I went to a Hillel club fair and bumped into Shayna Levitan who was my brother's friend," said Shack, who is the publicity co-ordinator of the group.

Levitan, the group's manager who was one of the original members of the group that was founded by former director Jeremy Burko in 2002, told him about the Varsity Jews.

After seeing the group perform at a Hillel Shabbat dinner, he auditioned to be part of the 16-person choir.

"I think the music can help students engage in a deeper connection with the Jewish community," Shack said.

At the Sunday night performance, Shack said people can expect to hear traditional Jewish standards such as Yerushalayim Shel Zahav in a cappella arrangements, as well as parodies.

"We've put an interesting twist on Jewish standards as well as classic rock songs," he said, adding that they changed the name of a song called Rainbow Connection, originally sung by Kermit the Frog in The Muppet Movie, to Jewish Connection and changed the lyrics to be about Jewish geography.

"We like to think our music is enjoyable for any age group. Everyone finds our music humorous. The crowds usually get into it, tapping their feet and clapping their hands to the beat."

Since the Varsity Jews made their debut as the first campus Jewish a cappella group in Canada four years ago, another group emerged out of York University called Kol Neshama and they will be performing that night as well.

Last year, the Varsity Jews managed to raise about $2,500 for One Family Fund, an organization that supports families of Israeli victims of terror.

This year, Shack said the goal is to sell 1,000 tickets. Thanks to the generosity of an anonymous donor who offered to match whatever they can raise this year, they hope to raise $10,000 for Save a Child's Heart, which would be enough money to pay for a heart transplant at the Wolfson Medical centre in Holon.

Iran's air force not a threat to IAF, officer says

By YAAKOV KATZ
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Iran's air force does not pose a threat to the Israeli Air Force, a high-ranking IDF officer told the Jerusalem Post.

IAF warplanes, the officer said, are capable of overcoming the air defence systems of all of Israel's neighbours.

"None of our neighbours pose an aerial threat that the air force would not be able to deal with," he told the Post.

He stressed, however, that Tehran's race for nuclear weapons is not exclusively Israel's problem.

"Israel's greatest threat these days comes from Iran and their efforts to obtain nuclear power," he said. "But this is not just our problem and is a threat to the entire free world."

The Iranian air force is made up of MiG 29 squadrons and other warplanes, some 30 years old. Iran's air defence systems, which are currently heavily deployed near the various nuclear sites, also feature Russian SA-2, SA-5, SA-6 and shoulder-launched SA-7 missiles, according to a report prepared by Tel Aviv University's Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies. The Iranians also have aged U.S.-made Hawk missiles and have been seeking to purchase the sophisticated S-300P from Russia.

The United States is the preferable choice for launching a military strike against Iran, the officer said. "America is a world superpower," he said. "And they could do it the best."

But, the officer added, Israel is closely following diplomatic developments on Iran at the United Nations Security Council. "At this stage, we believe that the U.S. and Europeans will stop Iran and its crazy leader [Mahmoud Ahmadinejad]," he said.

Similar remarks were made two weeks ago by former IDF chief of staff Lt.-Gen. (res.) Moshe Ya'alon, who said the IAF is capable of carrying out air strikes against several dozen sites. Earlier this month, the Post reported that Israel's Arrow 2 missile defense system is capable of intercepting Iranian Shihab and Scud missiles.

The air force, the IAF officer said, is continuously purchasing new planes and developing new capabilities to ensure it maintains superiority over Israel's enemies and deters them from even thinking of an attack. He said Syria, for example, recently abandoned attempts to build a strong air force and has started investing most of its defence funding in ground-to-ground missiles.

But while Israel has not ruled out military action against Iran, Mofaz told the Post this month he believes diplomatic efforts could succeed in stopping Tehran's race for the bomb.

"If the [expected UN Security Council] sanctions – and the Iranians are afraid of them – will be extensive and decisive, they can influence the Iranians," he said. As to the possibility of an Israeli military strike against Iran, Mofaz said, "Israel will defend itself."

In an interview last week with the Post, Gary Berntsen, the former senior CIA operative who led the search for Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan in 2001, said that he, too, believes Israel should not carry out any operation.

"It's better for the United States to do it. If you [Israel] do it, we'll have all sorts of problems in the Middle East, all sorts of countries that will align themselves with the Iranians over this. Politically it makes more sense for the U.S. to do it."

He said the United States has the ability to easily destroy Iran's nuclear facilities and could use bunker-buster bombs and other weapons to do so.

"We can take care of it in a couple of days with air strikes, and they wouldn't be able to stop us," he added.

Berntsen, who left the CIA last June after more than 20 years of service, believes it will be difficult to persuade Iran to stop its nuclear program.

"They are determined to get this no matter what, and they will lie and cheat and do whatever they have to do to get themselves a weapon," he said.

Berntsen ruled out covert action because of the scale of Iran's nuclear program. "This is a huge system of facilities they have. This is not going to be a small sort of engagement. We are probably going to have to destroy 30 facilities in 30 locations," he said.

Berntsen also ruled out a ground operation. "This is a huge country. There are 70 million people there. It's gigantic. We don't need to be getting into something like that," he said.

However, he believes the United States should first exhaust all political options. He added that if Iran doesn't disarm, U.S. President George W. Bush will carry out an attack regardless of domestic opposition. "This is a guy who doesn't put his finger in the air to see which way the wind is blowing. President Bush means business."

PA won't arrest terrorists

Hamas' designated chief of the Palestinian Authority security forces said he would not arrest wanted terrorists. "The day will never come when any Palestinian would be arrested because of his political affiliation or because of resisting the occupation," Sayed Seyam, the interior minister in the new Hamas-led government, told Reuters. Seyam even said PA security forces would actively oversee attacks on Israel. "Talks with the factions in the future will focus on the mechanisms, the shape and the timing" of attacks, he said.

Israel helps PA with bird flu

Israel pitched in to help Palestinians contain a suspected outbreak of bird flu in Gaza. Israeli veterinarians were dispatched to advise their Palestinian counterparts after several dozen chickens died at a Gaza farm, apparently the latest victims of the H5N1 virus discovered this month in Israel. Israel is also testing the carcasses on behalf of the PA. In the West Bank, Palestinian farmers have been placed on alert for further outbreaks.

Libya halts peace trek

An interfaith peace trek across the Sahara ground to a halt when Libya refused to let in the Israeli participants. The Jerusalem Post, which sent a reporter to cover the month-long desert voyage by the coexistence group Breaking the Ice, reported that the nine trekkers were turned back to Egypt after reaching the Libyan border. "Israel does not exist as a country, it is Palestine. We don't allow occupiers into our country," a Libyan official was quoted as saying. The nine-member group includes three Israelis, as well as a Palestinian, an Iraqi and an Iranian. Libyan leader Moamar Gadhafi also pledged his support for Hamas during a visit to Libya by the group's exiled leader, Khaled Meshal.

Bush: U.S. will protect Israel

U.S. President George W. Bush said the United States would use "all military might" to protect Israel. Asked about Iran's nuclear threat, he told Cleveland's City Club, " I've made it clear, and I'll make it clear again, that we will use military might to protect our ally, Israel."

Western Wall cable car?

The city of Jerusalem may make the Western Wall accessible by cable car. Quoting a municipal source, Yediot Achronot reported there is preliminary approval for a plan to erect a cable-car network linking the Old City's Wall Plaza with a station on the far side of the Hinnom Valley, half a mile away. The project aims to relieve congestion on the roads and walkways leading to Judaism's holiest site.

Israeli town copes with Qassams

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

SDEROT, Israel — " It's a disaster, period," exclaimed Eli Moyal, the mayor of this embattled development town in the northern Negev desert.

"Two Qassams fell at 7:30 this morning in an empty field, and the day is not even over," he fumed, puffing on an acrid cigarette.

It was high noon in Sderot, 18 kilometres south of Ashkelon and only a few kilometres east of the Gaza Strip, on this day in the first week of March.

Moyal, the son of Moroccan immigrants, was in a combative mood as he talked about the plague of Palestinian Qassam rockets that have hammered this town of 25,000 inhabitants, sometimes with deadly results, since March 2002.

"Yesterday, we got eight Qassams," he said, his voice growing still more indignant."Our enemies are very close. They have thousands of Qassams in their arsenal."

Eli Moyal

For the past four years, ever since it became the first Israeli city to be targeted by these crude short-range rockets, Sderot, mainly populated by North African and Russian Jews, has borne the brunt of the Qassam barrage.

Hamas, which developed the Qassam to circumvent the security barrier that the Israeli army erected around Gaza in the 1990s, successfully fired the first Qassam into Israel in February 2002, approximately 1½ years after the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising.

In the face of these attacks, Israel launched its first armed incursions into the Palestinian autonomous areas since the 1993 Oslo accords, thereby changing the dynamics of its often contentious relationship with the Palestinian Authority.

Hamas and the even more radical Islamic Jihad have fired more than 1,000 Qassams at Israeli settlements since 2002, with Sderot paying the heaviest price in terms of casualties and property damage.

On June 28, 2004, the first two civilians in Sderot were killed by Qassams. Sderot suffered two more fatalities – two Ethiopian children – on Sept. 29 of that year. A fifth resident died of his wounds on Jan. 21, 2005.

In addition, many other local residents have been injured, Moyal noted.

Moyal, whose home was one of the first residential structures in Sderot to be damaged by a Qassam, said that tens of buildings have been hit. "We've stopped counting," he said with an exasperated tone.

The Qassams have had a negative effect on commerce, observed Moyal, a Likud politician who succeeded the current leader of the Labor party, Amir Peretz, as mayor in 1998.

"Business is totally down," he reported glumly.

In a bid to revive morale, the Israeli government has encouraged companies to invest in Sderot.

"Ten factories have been built here in the last two years," Moyal said. "We have jobs and zero unemployment, but salaries are very low, minimum wage."

The biggest impact of the Qassams has been psychological. "This is the major problem," he said in an interview in his sun-dappled office in the centre of Sderot, which is marking its 50th anniversary as a town this year.

"Half the kids suffer from post-traumatic stress. They can't concentrate on their studies. They refuse to go out after sunset. They sleep with their parents. The backfiring from cars scares them. Three kids have been hospitalized."

Moyal is less than sanguine about the future.

"This problem will become worse. A lot of dangerous weapons are being smuggled into Gaza through Egypt. The Qassams are becoming more sophisticated and deadly. They will inflict more casualties. An Al Qaeda cell is operating in Gaza."

Moyal urged the government to act more aggressively against Palestinian launchers of Qassams. "We know the addresses and names of the terrorists in Gaza. We know where they sleep."

In a reference to the nearby Gaza town where many of the launches have taken place, he said, "The Israeli army should destroy Beit Hanoun. Let it be vanished. But Israel is doing nothing. There is no government in Jerusalem. We are weak. Our spirit is broken. We have no leadership, no ideology. We are facing war, and I say this loudly and clearly."

In fact, Israel has retaliated. Prior to its unilateral withdrawal from Gaza last summer, Israel raided Beit Hanoun repeatedly, but to no avail.

In still other actions, Israel targeted Hamas bomb makers. In a helicopter strike on Oct. 2004, Israel eliminated Adnan al-Ghoul, the developer of the Qassam rocket. Last month, Israel killed Islamic Jihad's chief rocket maker, Khaled Dahdiouh, in Gaza City.

Last year, Israel installed the new Maamim radar system to give residents sufficient time to find refuge. But in a scathing report issued last January, Israel's state comptroller, Micha Lindenstrauss, accused the government of dragging its feet in protecting border towns such as Sderot.

And the Qassams keep coming, lamented Avi Sulimani, the director of Sderot's sole community centre, a non-descript building less than five minutes away by car from Moyal's office.

"It's very frightening," said Sulimani, whose parents were Iranian immigrants. "We're only one kilometre from Beit Hanoun by air. Many homes don't even have bomb shelters. It's a very big problem. The government has promised to reinforce roofs, but the work is proceeding too slowly due to budgetary reasons. We have only 15 to 20 seconds to run to a shelter once a Qassam has been fired."

Sulimani said that about 50 families have left Sderot since the Qassam reign of terror began, and he noted the value of homes has plunged by one-third.

"Sderot is not a pressing issue for the government," he charged. "The government is interested in Tel Aviv and the centre of the country, but not the periphery. If Kfar Saba was attacked by missiles, the government would find a solution. Sometimes, we feel the state has other priorities. Sderot is the test of Zionism."

Sulimani, nevertheless, has no intention of succumbing to despair. Recently, in a spirit of defiance, the community centre's youth choir released a cassette titled I'm Not Afraid of the Qassams.

Although he thirsts for revenge, Sulimani would oppose an Israeli re-occupation of Gaza. "It would be very dangerous for our soldiers. Air bombardments would be better."

What of the future? He smiled. "God only knows."

Israel's first post-ideological election

territory without receiving concessions in return.

This, then, is Israel's first post-ideological election. There is widespread consensus that both peace and Greater Israel are unattainable. The argument is over tactics, not vision.

That's why the centrist party, Kadima, continues to lead in the polls – despite having replaced Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, the country's most popular politician, with acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, one of the country's least popular politicians. Kadima, an alliance of disillusioned Likudniks and Laborites, is in effect Israel's first national unity government in the guise of a party. Kadima has declared the end of the left-right debate over the territories, and proclaimed both sides the losers.

Olmert has promised to unilaterally set Israel's borders within the next four years. Shaul Mofaz, Kadima's defence minister, wants it to happen within the next two. Kadima's policy is a return to the pre-Oslo vision of former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, who promised, in his 1992 campaign, not peace but separation – in his words, to "take Gaza out of Tel Aviv and Tel Aviv out of Gaza."

This election is the political equivalent of the security fence: an expression of despair, and even revulsion, toward Palestinian society. Kadima represents the victory of the left's policy of withdrawal, but for right-wing reasons. Israelis have rejected both the peace process and Greater Israel, not only because those policies didn't work but because each, in its way, would continue to entangle them with the Palestinians.

Yet Kadima's unilateralism is hardly an exciting option, even for those of us who support it. Unilateralism, after all, is an admission that our extravagant politics of expansionism and concessions have failed. And with the rise of Hamas, unilateralism, though never more justified in principle, has also never seemed more risky. Can we really withdraw and further empower a Hamas regime that would bring Iranian weapons and advisers to the outskirts of Tel Aviv and Jerusalem? Or is a military confrontation in which Israel destroys the Hamas infrastructure on the West Bank a prerequisite for a relatively safe unilateral withdrawal? Either way, not much reason for a unilateralist to gloat.

Even more than Kadima, the party that most explicitly represents the longing for separation from the Palestinians is the largely Russian party, Yisrael Beiteinu, Israel Our Home, headed by Avigdor Lieberman, a former Netanyahu aide. In synthesizing positions identified with the far left and the far right, Yisrael Beiteinu offers its own bizarre version of the centre.

Lieberman, who lives in a West Bank settlement, has adopted the left's warning against the demographic threat to the Jewish state of annexation. He even supports redrawing the border in Jerusalem, along ethnic lines. But, he argues, why stop at the 1967 border? About 20 per cent of Israel's population, after all, is Arab, whose emotional loyalties lie in Palestine. Why not simply move the security fence around Arab-Israeli areas and unilaterally withdraw? Lieberman has even offered to evacuate his own settlement, in exchange for moving the fence around Arab-Israeli towns and villages which he considers a humane version of the far right's vision of "transfer" of Arabs from the Jewish state.

> 'Kadima's unilateralism is hardly an exciting option'

In truth, probably most Israeli Jews would welcome separation from the area known as the Triangle, which borders the West Bank and is the centre of Israel's growing Muslim fundamentalist movement. Sharon raised that possibility about two years ago, but reconsidered when confronted with the fact that international law forbids stripping citizens of their citizenship against their will. Yossi Beilin, architect of the Oslo process and now head of Meretz, once raised the possibility of a territorial swap between the Triangle and the West Bank settlement bloc of Gush Etzion near Jerusalem.

Yet, however tempting, Lieberman's approach is disastrous. Yisrael Beiteinu is the first mainstream party – polls show it gaining more than 10 seats – to target Arab Israelis as the enemy. Given the constraints of international and Israeli law, the only likely outcome of Lieberman's proposal will be to further alienate Arab citizens and increase the prospect of civil war. And so, even as the pragmatic centre of Kadima replaces the utopian left and right, Yisrael Beiteinu is proving that the centre isn't immune from the politics of fantasy.

'France has produced monsters,' Ilan Halimi's mother says

BY BRETT KLINE
JTA

PARIS — Ruth Halimi is afraid. Since her son Ilan was tortured to death in February, she hasn't had a moment's peace. Her life has been ravaged forever.

"It's a nightmare," she says. "Sometimes I think I'll wake up and find it isn't so, but it is. Ilan is gone, and I must keep on living. I must keep on living."

In her modest apartment, she receives journalists but insists that they take no pictures of her.

"I don't want my face in the newspapers, on television or on the Internet," she says. "I'm afraid there are more barbarians out there and that they'll find me."

Ilan Halimi, 23, was left for dead in the train station of a Paris suburb on Feb. 13 after being kidnapped and tortured for three weeks by a gang demanding ransom. He died on the way to the hospital.

More than 10 suspects have been arrested, including the leader of the gang, Youssouf Fofana, who was extradited from the Ivory Coast, where his parents were born.

Suspects told police that they tried to kidnap Jews because "all Jews are rich," and that they put cigarettes out on the victim's face because "he was Jewish and we don't like Jews."

Halimi says something is wrong with the educational system in France.

"France has produced monsters," she says, her face thin and skin tight, fraught by nerves and pain. "It's not about being Muslim, because all the gang members went to secular, public schools. They have grown up with no feelings, like mechanical monsters."

Most of the gang members were Muslim, of North African Arab and black African origins, but others involved were not, including the superintendent of the building where Halimi was held.

"They promised him 1,500 euros, so he gave them an empty apartment to use and said nothing," Halimi said of the superintendent. "What kind of a man is that?"

She answers her own question: "It's a man who simply does not care."

Many residents reportedly knew someone was being tortured in the basement, but did not intervene or alert authorities.

"It was an open secret in the neighbourhood that a Jew was being held and tortured, and nobody called the police anonymously, not one person," she says, shaking her head. "The elevator was blocked for 10 days and people were guarding the door to the apartment, and nobody called the police. It was not that all those neighbours were anti-Semitic. It's more that they simply did not care."

She doesn't find it difficult to believe that most French people do not think this was an anti-Semitic crime.

"Everyone agrees that this is a sick crime," she says, "but beyond that, most French people simply do not care, one way or the other. That's the way they are."

Halimi has been very critical of the French police. She says they broke the first rule in the book by telling her to break off contact with the kidnappers.

"Everyone knows you maintain contact. Otherwise, they become enraged, and that is exactly what happened," she said.

Even Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy "told me that the police had failed. He said, 'I am taking this personally because I am the head of the police.'"

"I feel like the French police abandoned me," she adds. "I think they wanted to catch the gang members, but they were not thinking about Ilan. It was cold-blooded, with no feeling, like they didn't care."

She is careful to say she has nothing against Muslims.

"I grew up with Muslims in Casablanca, in Morocco," she says. "I never had any problems, never. The problem is with France. I think the country has become sick from a lack of feelings, a lack of emotion."

Halimi says she always has been a religious Jew.

"I have always prayed to God," she says. "I still pray every day. This is what gets me through every day.

"Without my God, I would have collapsed already. They took my baby boy."

She begins to cry. The tears flow. She does not try to stop them. Her son-in-law Rafi is there. There are friends in the apartment. People from her building stop by regularly.

"There are good people here," she says.

Halimi wants to leave France.

"Ilan always wanted to go the United States," she says. "The whole family wants to go. Myself, I want to go to New York."

For the first time, she has a small smile on her face, but it does not last.

The murder was front-page news for weeks, but now it has been replaced by a new drama rioting in the streets over a new labour law for young people.

No trial date has been set, but Halimi trusts her lawyer, Francis Spizner. "He wants to tear these guys apart," she says.

Halimi's ex-husband has been talking to the press, but she does not talk to him.

The tears have returned. The French Jewish community is taking care of her needs – she and her family will not go hungry. But she no longer feels at home in France. And her boy Ilan is gone forever.

Culling of flu-infected poultry nearly complete

By RUTH EGLASH
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israel's Agriculture Ministry announced Saturday that it had nearly completed the culling and burying of poultry infected with the H5N1 strain of bird flu in several communities in the south.

Last Friday, Army Radio reported that Israel's Chief Sephardi Rabbi Shlomo Amar permitted the continued culling of poultry throughout Shabbat because he decided it was a life-saving measure.

More than one million chickens and turkeys have been destroyed at Kibbutzim Ein Hashlosha, Nir Oz, Sde Moshe and Holit, as well as Moshav Amioz, since the virus was first detected earlier this month.

Poultry was also found to be contaminated with the virus in the nearby Palestinian Authority-controlled Gaza Strip, where more than 13,000 birds were destroyed.

Meanwhile, Ma'ariv reported on its website that birds found dead on a farm in the Galilee region did not die from the bird flu virus.

Veterinarians confirmed last Thursday that the H5N1 strain of bird flu that was found in several communities in the south of the country had also been detected on a moshav in the Jordan Valley.

Eshkol Regional Council head Uri Naamati said, however, that no new cases of avian flu had been found on farms in the Eshkol region in the south. The Agriculture Ministry also carried out tests on bird carcasses found in the Sharon region Thursday, but results showed that the birds had not died from the virus.

Meanwhile, following the discovery of bird flu in Gaza, Health Minister Ya'acov Edri directed his ministry to give the Palestinian Authority 300 doses of Tamiflu tablets, which are designed to combat the deadly virus.

Late last Thursday night, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz responded positively to a request from PA President Mahmoud Abbas to transfer poison to Gaza to assist in exterminating the infected chickens in the area.

The decision to help the Palestinian Authority came as a result of a request issued by a World Health Organization official to the Health Ministry.

Experts estimated that the outbreak of bird flu in Israel would cost the state between 25 million to 30 million shekels.

For farmers affected by the virus, the main question now is of compensation, Naamati said.

"I believe we will be compensated," he said, adding that the government had promised to reimburse farmers at a 50 per cent advance on direct damages within the next week, with the rest of the compensation to follow in a month.

Singer gave up banking to pursue music

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Amanda Martinez admits it was a gutsy move, but she has no regrets.

After landing a job as the Latin American relationship manager with one of Canada's leading banks after graduating with a master's degree in international business from York University, Martinez left it all after six months to pursue her passion – singing.

"I realized after I started working that my heart wasn't into what I was doing," she says. After seeing a musical performance at a midday concert at the First Canadian Place in downtown Toronto, Martinez quit her job and hasn't looked back.

Amanda Martinez

Martinez is one of several singers performing as part of Global Divas: A Celebration of International Women and Song at Kool Haus, 132 Queens Quay E. on March 30 at 8 p.m.

The daughter of a Mexican-born father and South African Jewish mother, Martinez says music was always part of family gatherings. Travelling to Mexico gave her a feel for the jazz, Latino and Afro Cuban music scene in which she's been performing professionally since 2001.

"I grew up listening to a lot of my dad's musical collection, which had a huge influence on me," she says. "Music is in my blood."

This is Martinez's first performance with the Global Divas project, now in its fourth year.

Global Divas features some of Canada's rising and esteemed global music artists, all immigrants, or children of immigrants, and raises money for St. Stephen's Community House, which provides accommodation and counselling for immigrants, the homeless, youths and low-income families in the Kensington and surrounding areas of Toronto.

This year, proceeds go toward the St. Stephen's Youth Arcade, a drop-in program designed to accommodate the needs of adolescents from diverse backgrounds.

"This is an amazing opportunity to help the youth in our community," Martinez says. "For me it is exciting to perform alongside these women."

Martinez is also excited about her upcoming solo CD, Solas, to be released this June. "It will contain a mixture of different influences - Brazilian, Mexican folk and Afro Cuban rhythms," she says. She composed some of the songs herself. She sings primarily in Spanish and Portuguese and also has a handful of songs in English.

On March 30, she will perform about three songs and will be backed up by the event's musical director, Jane Bunnett, and her band Spirits of Havana.

Other artists at the concert include African music performer Muna Mingole; Inuk throat singer Tanya Tagaq Gillis, who will be showcasing her unique vocal stylings; award-winning jazz singer Kellylee Evans; and Zaki Ibrahim, whose music is shaped by the diversity of her South African apartheid-era hometown.

When she's not singing, Martinez can be heard hosting Café Latino on Jazz FM 91.1, a show that incorporates Latin jazz with Afro Cuban and salsa.

"This is a great learning experience," she says of her show. "I get great feedback from my listeners. There are only a few stations that showcase this type of music."

Tickets for the Global Divas concert are $30 and can be purchased at Ticketmaster, 416-870-8000 or www.ticketmaster.ca. Or call the Global Divas hotline at 416-925-2103, ext. 238. Gala tickets are also available from the hotline.

Comedian/actor Howie Mandel becomes a game-show host

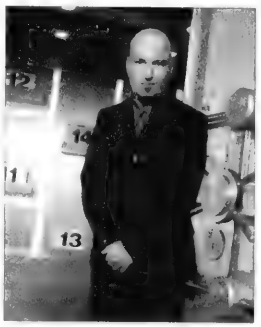
By BYRON PASCOE & PAUL TELNER
Special to The CJN

Entertainer Howie Mandel didn't finish high school and went into retail like any good Jew, he said.

"I was selling carpet. I thought I would be in business, get married and live within a 10-mile radius from where I grew up in North York. I would have been happy doing that."

His television, film and stage success "came out of left field," he said.

On a lark, while on vacation in Los Angeles in the 1970s, Mandel got up on stage on amateur night at The Comedy Store. "There was a producer in the audience who said, 'How would you like to do television?' I thought it was a joke, it was so cliché Hollywood," he recalled.



Howie Mandel

It turned out the producer had a television show called Make Me Laugh, which became Mandel's ticket to the talk- show circuit from Mike Douglas to Merv Griffin. Diana Ross saw Mandel and invited him to open for her at Caesar's Palace.

Mandel and his girlfriend, Terry, now his wife and mother of his three children, moved to California, where he gained respect and recognition for his standup comedy specials.

"I went to a general audition and as luck would have it, they fired somebody off of a pilot. It was St. Elsewhere," he said.

Playing Dr. Wayne Fiscus for six seasons on the NBC hospital drama led to Mandel's feature films roles in the '80s, before the explosion of his animated series Bobby's World, which is based on one of his standup comedy characters. The Emmy-nominated children series ran eight seasons on Fox and now appears in syndication six days a week in 65 countries.

Since then, he's had his own talk show, done more film and television and continued to perform standup.

Last November, Mandel got a call to host a new game show. "Absolutely not," he told the producer. "You just read cards with trivia questions. "They called me back and asked to spend an hour to talk about the game. I said, 'Ya know what, I'm a little hungry and I'm heading to a deli. Come and buy me a sandwich.' I am a Jew at heart. The way to me is through lunch."

The producer showed up, paid for Mandel's pastrami sandwich, and pitched the show. "I thought I was being 'punk'd' [a reference to a TV show that pulls pranks on celebrities]," Mandel said.

"It [the game] looked like an eighth grader had done a school project. He had a game board, described the show and we played the game. There are no skills needed or stunts. I said, 'You can be a moron and become a millionaire' and he says 'yes'."

In Deal or No Deal, a contestant is asked to choose one out of 26 briefcases. Each one contains a card representing an amount of money, from one cent to $1 million. After selecting a briefcase, the contestant singles out other cases to reveal their contents.

Whenever the bank calls with an offer, the contestant chooses between staying with his or her original briefcase or making a 'deal' to accept the bank's cash offer.

The producers wanted Mandel because of his diverse skills. "They were fans of my talk show and needed someone who can interview and flesh out who these people are. It's done in front of a live audience, it's kind of loose and unscripted, and so they wanted someone who can be comedic and improvisational, which uses my standup skills," he said.

"They love the drama and tension that I could create as an actor. There are moments in this game that are very tense and dramatic, and they said that I could increase that for them. They were giving me this one little vehicle where I could do everything I love to do in my career, all in one place. I said okay."

The NBC series premiered last December for five consecutive nights. Thanks to good ratings, the show returned for a full week in February, before returning each Monday. Thanks to even better ratings, this cultural phenomenon is now seen Mondays and Fridays on Global TV at 8 p.m.

Another aspect of Mandel's career are his hidden-camera stunts that sometimes appear on the Tonight Show or Live with Regis and Kelly. They led to Hidden Howie: The Private Life of a Public Nuisance. Mandel's sitcom/reality TV series that goes back and forth between his family life and his infamous hidden-camera bits on unsuspecting people. It airs on Bravo in Canada, Saturday nights at 11:30 p.m.

Mandel openly credits luck for his success, supports being passionate about whatever it is you do in life and acknowledges his parents for his sense of humour. "Humour was our way of life," he said. "A sense of humour for me isn't someone who can do a joke. It's finding the humour where other people don't find it, and that's why it's a sense. Usually in what other people would find as tragic or stressful moments is where I found humour."

Mandel performs as many as 200 shows a year throughout the United States and Canada.

"To this day, I'll go play a 10,000-seat auditorium, and when we finish I'll find the local comedy club and do free sets. I'm lucky enough that enough people are asking [me to perform], that I don't have to sell carpet anymore during the day.

"But if I had to sell carpet and show up to the club at night and do standup, I promise you I would be just as happy."

SHOLOM ALEICHEM LEGACY CELEBRATED

Ten community organizations are jointly sponsoring Hello Sholom Aleichem!, a show celebrating the colourful world of the great Yiddish writer Sholom Aleichem on his 90th yahrzeit.

Sholom Aleichem, of course, is the revered Yiddish writer whose beloved Tevye the Dairyman stories were the basis for the Broadway musical Fiddler on the Roof.

Sholom Aleichem

Headlining the event is Rafael Goldwaser, the acclaimed French actor and mime, presenting dramatic interpretations of some of the stories that best demonstrate the writer's wit, satirical insight and humanity.

Actor Harvey Atkin hosts the show, which also features Yiddish singer Theresa Tova, guitarist-pianist Bryan Katz, singer-actor Mitch Smolkin and the Bialik Hebrew Day School Choir.

This lively afternoon of theatre and music (in Yiddish and English) is free, but a voluntary contribution of $5 will be gratefully accepted at the door. Beth Tzedec Congregation, 1700 Bathurst St. Sunday, April 2, 2 p.m.

The 10 sponsors are: the Ashkenaz Foundation, Beth Tzedec Max and Beatrice Wolfe Library, Beth Tzedec Renee and Victor Topper Endowment, Beth Tzedec Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum, Committee for Yiddish of UJA Federation, Friends of Yiddish, Label Basman Fund, Miransky Fund, Winchevsky Centre and Workmen's Circle.

Sophie Scholl is a cinematic profile in civil courage

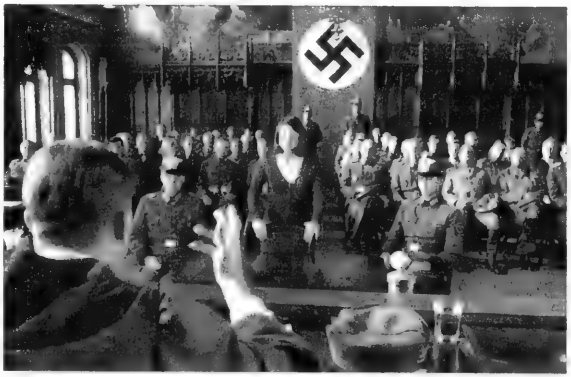
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter



Julia Jentsch portrays Sophie Scholl in a new movie about the anti-Nazi White Rose group opening in Toronto on April 7.

There is no shortage of feature films about Sophie Scholl, the legendary anti-Nazi heroine executed in February 1943.

Michael Verhoeven's The White Rose and Percy Adlon's The Last Five Days dutifully paid homage to Scholl, a bright 21-year-old student who was a beacon of light in a landscape of darkness in the dying days of Nazi Germany.

Whereas The White Rose culminated with Scholl's arrest and The Last Five Days unfolded through the eyes of Scholl's cellmate, Else Gebel, Marc Rothemund's new film, Sophie Scholl: The Final Days, focuses on the last six days of her captivity.

Based, in part, on the original minutes of her Gestapo interrogation, which were unearthed in the 1990s, Sophie Scholl is a serious film blessed with a stellar cast and an absorbing screenplay by Fred Breindersdorfer.

Not surprisingly, Sophie Scholl, which is scheduled to open in Toronto on April 7, was nominated for this year's Academy Award as best foreign film.

Julia Jentsch, one of Germany's finest actresses, portrays Scholl in what can only be described as a tour de force performance. Jentsch, 28, melts into her personality and character and easily convinces viewers that she is Scholl writ large.

An idealist, Scholl swam against the tide of conformism.

As a member of the White Rose resistance movement, whose impact was far greater than its actual membership, she lambasted the totalitarian nature of the Nazi regime and called for its downfall, blasted its war policies and attacked Hitler's anti-Semitic plank and practices. She did this at a time when the vast majority of Germans either supported the Nazis or cowardly retreated into silence and indifference.

As the film opens, Scholl and her older brother and mentor, a Wehrmacht veteran and medical student, are busily producing the latest series of anti-Nazi leaflets they plan to mail and distribute at a Munich university.

The very idea that they will brazenly deposit these leaflets on campus is mind-boggling. What conviction and courage it must take to carry out this selfless act of resistance.

As they leave the university building after dropping their leaflets from a balcony, a janitor stops the Scholls, and soon they are arrested.

The film, as the title suggests, turns on Sophie's interrogation, her sham trial and her execution.

The Gestapo interrogator, Robert Mohr (Alexander Held), can hardly believe that so demure and soft-spoken a creature has staked her life for what is clearly a hopeless cause.

At first, Scholl tries to convince Mohr that her arrest was a colossal mistake. She claims that she is apolitical and that she is not a White Rose member.

He seems to buy her story, and Sophie can already taste the heady whiff of freedom. But when Mohr presents her with incontrovertible evidence of her involvement, she confesses with alacrity.

Scholl's confession touches off something a debate. Mohr argues that Hitler has been good for Germany. She counters that Hitler has led Germany astray into an unwinnable war.

Undeterred by her arguments, Mohr denigrates her "false ideas" and predicts that the Nazis will reign supreme over the "new Europe."

Sophie raises questions about Nazi anti-Semitism and the extermination of European Jews. Mohr, weakly, claims that Jews have been permitted to emigrate.

Evincing sympathy for Scholl, Mohr tries to give her a way out of her predicament, but she refuses to compromise her deeply held beliefs.

At their trial, the presiding judge, Roland Freisler (Andre Hennicke), rants and raves, mercilessly attacking Scholl and her co-defendants. Much to their disgrace, their state-appointed lawyers do not raise a single objection to Freisler's crude methods.

Their fate is a foregone conclusion, and when they are guillotined, the screen goes appropriately black.

Sophie Scholl: The Final Days is a profile of civil courage in the face of incredible oppression and violence. It's a film that hammers home the point that some Germans never wavered in their absolute fealty to a noble cause.

Susan Michaels, conducting The Renanim Youth Singers, The Miles Nadal JCC Youth Singers, UofT's Varsity Blues and York's Kol Neshama at their Passover concert, Ashira L'Adoshem, From Generation to Generation.

Choral festival long overdue

By CHARLES HELLER
Special to The CJN

Following the demise of Jewish Music Toronto, it has been a while since Toronto has had a Jewish choral festival.

The concert at Leah Posluns last week, organized by the indefatigable Susan Michaels, was therefore long overdue and most welcome. Five choirs, with members ranging in age from eight to 80, joined forces in a pre-Pesach program.

The Miles Nadal JCC Youth Singers presented a composition, The Ocean, written by the children themselves, which was a cute idea. But it was a bit of a chutzpah to present a work-in-progress to a paying audience (even the child Mozart's works had to be polished by his father before being performed in public). A few Orff instruments would have helped. (Orff instruments for children began to be developed in 1928 by K. Maendler under the direction of composer Carl Orff. They were modelled after an African instrument, a handmade wood xylophone.)

The two university choirs, Varsity Jews and Kol Neshama, projected a sense of fun, and it was also a pleasure to hear from the very assured Miles Nadal JCC Community Choir. Michaels' own Renanim Youth Singers presented some well-chosen pieces, and Mark Andrews was the very fine accompanist.

The human voice is the most beautiful instrument, and voices combined are more beautiful still. But to express this we need appropriate repertoire (especially in a children's choir), not pop tunes, and certainly not songs with a wide range (otherwise the choir will simply sing wrong notes).

There were occasional flashes of real choral sound and Mark Saltzman's Hallelujah provided a rousing finale – it should have been encored.

One other pet peeve: the printed program did not distinguish between the composer and the arranger. For example Srul Glick, himself a stickler for accuracy in such matters, was not the composer of the well-known Avinu Malkeinu and no one was credited with the arrangement of Stephen Schwartz's When You Believe, performed so warmly by the combined choirs.

The concert was in part a fundraiser to send the Renanim choir to Israel. We trust that the experience of working with Israel's outstanding choral educators will help establish solid roots for the rebirth of Jewish choral music in Toronto.

TOLKIEN MUSICAL OPENS: Rebecca Jackson Mendoza who plays Galadriel is pictured alongside the ensemble at the world premiere production of The Lord of the Rings at the Princess of Wales Theatre last week. The three-and-a-half hour show opened to reviews varying from all-out raves to pans, but most agree there is something to enjoy for everyone. Lord of the Rings is a presentation of Saul Zaentz and Kevin Wallace in association with Toronto's Mirvish Productions and Michael Cohl. The director is Matthew Warchus, the choreographer Peter Darling, set designer Rob Howell. Book and lyrics are by Shaun McKenna and Warchus. Tickets prices range from $56 to $125.

New edition of Wiesel's Night not from Yiddish original

Night* by Elie Wiesel. New translation by Marion Wiesel, Hill and Wang, 2006.

By NORM RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

The recent rerelease of Elie Wiesel's Night includes two notable features – the cover sticker announcing the stamp of approval from Oprah's Book Club, and the absence, in the 39 titles listing Wiesel's published works, of his first publication, the 1956 Yiddish memoir Un di velt hot geshvign.

Norman Ravvin

Prior lists have also excluded this title, but in the new translation's preface, Wiesel himself refers to it as a "manuscript" written in his "mother tongue." The "manuscript" became Volume 117 in Mark Turkov's substantial Dos Poilishe Yidntum series, which included numerous yizkor bicher, memoirs and collections of historical documents related to World War II.

Wiesel suggests in his new preface that the "original Yiddish text" was "translated first into French, then into English." That gives the impression that Night (whether in French or in its English translation) and Un di velt hot geshvign are the same text.

The media, at the time of Oprah's announcement that Night would follow James Frey's now notorious A Million Little Pieces as her book-club pick, clearly believed this.

ABC News reported the following: "Night was originally published in Yiddish and first published in Buenos Aires in 1956. Two years later, a compressed, 127-page French version was published…" USA Today was vaguer, but equally lax in its fact checking, reporting that Wiesel "first wrote the book in the 1950s in Yiddish, then translated it into French…" CTV, citing its source as a 2002 interview Wiesel gave to the Chicago Tribune, repeated this description of the book's history. It was also common to read, in the mainstream and Jewish press, that Hill & Wang's 2006 edition of Night was a new translation from the "original Yiddish manuscript."

None of this is accurate, and as the mistakes and misrepresentations piled up in the wake of the Oprah news, it seemed that no one, not even Wiesel, recognized the confusion being created.

When La Nuit appeared in 1958, it was not presented as a translation of Un di velt hot geshvign. The French novel is roughly half the length of the Yiddish memoir, which runs to 245 pages. The two books map what historians now call the "machinery of destruction," the arrival of the German occupiers in Sighet, Transylvania; ghettoization; deportation; incarceration at Auschwitz, followed by a death march ending at Buchenwald. But the Yiddish precursor reads more straightforwardly as a memoir. It is more detailed in its portrait of actual figures and geography. It is more deeply imbued with the texture of Jewish life in prewar Transylvania, and it more readily reveals its status as a document created in the immediate postwar period.

La Nuit was dedicated to "la memoire de mes parents et de ma petite soeur, Tzipora." The dedication in Un di velt hot geshvign can be translated as: "This book is dedicated to the everlasting memory of my mother Sarah, my father Shloime and my little sister Tzipora, who perished at the hands of the German murderers."

Wiesel's method and tone in Un di velt hot geshvign resembles many of the other yizkor bicher published by Turkov in Argentina.

Like the contributors to these memory books, Wiesel names names, recalling many inhabitants of his home and portraying important aspects of prewar European Jewish life in Sighet. The Yiddish volume, too, is more useful as a historical document.

The new translation – like its predecessor – refers to Sighet as a "little town in Transylvania." In the Yiddish memoir it is called a shtot, a city, and described as the most important one in the large Jewish community of Marmoresh province. Thus, Yiddish readers were able to appreciate Sighet in historical context, while French and English readers find it diminished, or at least transformed into an example of the now mythic shtetl of prewar Jewry.

This tendency is promoted in the foreword by Francois Mauriac, which has travelled with Night through its French and English editions. Mauriac, rather than check his facts, writes of the "martyrdom… of the Jews of the little Transylvanian town called Sighet."

Wiesel acknowledges that his "original Yiddish text" and Night have different endings. In his preface to the new translation of Night, he notes that the Yiddish text included at its end the following "gloomy mediation": "And now, scarcely 10 years after Buchenwald, I realize that the world forgets quickly. Today, Germany is a sovereign state. The German army has been resuscitated. Ilse Koch, the notorious sadistic monster of Buchenwald, was allowed to have children and live happily ever after…"

But there is much more of interest in the conclusion to the Yiddish text that did not find its way into La Nuit or Night. In particular, the iconic image of the narrator, gazing at his cadaverous face in a mirror, takes on radically different meaning. In the Yiddish text, the narrator smashes the mirror with his fist, and recognizes his desire to write a book "based on the notes" he'd taken in Buchenwald. Where Night concludes in existential gloom, Un di velt hot geshvign affirms responsibility and the power of the creative act.

What can one say about the new translation from the French by Marion Wiesel? It is more elegant and more readable than the one done by Stella Rodway at the close of the 1950s. Still, a page-by-page comparison comes up with remarkably few substantive changes. The name of the Wiesels' maid in Sighet is changed from Martha to Maria. A clarification is added in an early scene in Auschwitz, as the narrator acknowledges that he did not know, upon his arrival, that the "cruel" face overseeing selection was Dr. Josef Mengele. Britishisms – like "flat" for apartment – are removed, and German camp terms, such as Blockaltteste and Appelplatz, replace their tamer English counterparts. Nazis, in the 1960 translation, call Jews "dirty swine," while their updated epithet is changed to "dirty dog."

We have not, with this new translation, recovered the little-remembered Yiddish text. One can understand ABC and its counterparts getting the record wrong, since the author and his publisher have not managed to set it straight. It would have been satisfying to open the new edition and find an English version of the longer and angrier Yiddish book. That outcome would have had a truly provocative historical and educational impact. For now, however, we have a more elegantly rendered Night, along with Oprah's best wishes.

Norman Ravvin is chair of Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies. His books include the novel Lola by Night and Hidden Canada: An Intimate Travelogue.

Oral-appliance therapy can help sleep apneics

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Ken Gibbs used to be lucky if he managed to get two to three hours of sleep a night. Afflicted with a severe case of sleep apnea, Gibbs' breathing stopped 60 times an hour, causing him to wake up and violently shake his bed.

Night after night of restless sleep made life difficult for Gibbs, a truck driver who works 12-hour shifts.

"It really affected my day," he said. "I was exhausted most of the time. It takes a toll on your body, and mentally and physically, it burns you out."

Sleep apnea is a potentially life-threatening sleep disorder in which the airway becomes blocked during sleep, leading to an obstruction in breathing. Once a sleep apneic's blood oxygen level starts to drop, the brain realizes that the person is suffocating, causing them to wake up in order to resume breathing.

Many sleep apneics are not even aware of having had a sleep disruption. But because they continually wake up, their sleep is fragmented and of poor quality, causing them to feel tired and potentially leading to a host of other health problems.

Sleep apnea is associated with everything from depression and memory lapses to being at a higher risk of having a heart attack or stroke. Studies say sleep apneics are anywhere from four to eight times more likely to have a heart attack or stroke.

Oral-appliance therapy, a treatment for sleep apnea, has helped Gibbs. It is now being recommended by the American Academy of Sleep Medicine for patients with moderate cases of sleep apnea. Until recently, the academy had only recommended the treatment, which has been around since the late 1980s, for patients with mild cases. The degree of severity of sleep apnea is diagnosed according to the number of breathing interruptions per hour. Forty or more interruptions per hour is considered severe, 20 to 40 is considered moderate, 10 to 20 is considered mild and less than 10 is regarded as primary snoring.

Les Priemer, a North York-area dentist who has been treating sleep apneics with oral-appliance therapy for 11 years, says there is a lack of knowledge among many patients about the treatment.

"The concern that patients have is that they walk into my office and say, 'How come nobody ever told me about this before?'" said Priemer.

Relief for those with sleep apnea has traditionally come in the form of an obtrusive device called a continuous positive airway pressure (CPAP) machine. It consists of a nasal mask connected to a hose that is in turn connected to a pump. The pump provides pressure through the mask to prevent the sleeper's airway from becoming blocked.

CPAP an effective treatment

Although an effective treatment for the condition, the CPAP machine is cumbersome and slightly noisy, the mask can be uncomfortable and the contraption can be less than agreeable to the sleeper's bedmate. And while CPAP has been traditionally recommended as the only first-line treatment for moderate sleep apnea cases, the new guidelines from the American Academy of Sleep Medicine mean oral appliance therapy can now be recommended as a first-line treatment as well.

Although Gibbs had severe sleep apnea, oral-appliance therapy has worked well for him.

He has been using it for the past two years and says it's helped turn his life around, estimating his condition has improved by 75 per cent.

"When I got the appliance, it was incredible," he said. "I don't go to bed without it."

Diagnosed with sleep apnea about nine years ago, Gibbs initially used a CPAP machine to manage his condition. Although it helped him, he found the machine cumbersome to travel with and less than ideal for personal reasons.

"You definitely don't want this if you're married because you have a hose in your nose – it's not very romantic," he said.

Oral-appliance therapy consists of a mouthpiece, usually made out of acrylic, that rests on the top and bottom arches of the mouth. The top and bottom pieces are connected and there's a hinge that allows the lower jaw to be comfortably moved forward, which in turn pulls the tongue off the back of the airway and allows the person to achieve more normal breathing.

Priemer estimates that around 1.4 million Canadians suffer from sleep apnea. While in the past it has been associated with overweight males, that is not always the case.

"Just because you're a skinny woman doesn't mean you can't have it. And unfortunately that's the problem sometimes – there's a misdiagnosis because a physician might say, 'Sorry, you don't fit the profile,'" he said, adding that obesity is indeed a major factor and there tends to be higher incidence of sleep apnea among people who are obese.

Getting the condition diagnosed and treated is critical. In Ontario, physicians are obligated to inform the Ministry of Transportation if they have patients with sleep apnea and patients are at risk of losing their drivers' licences if their condition goes untreated.

Imams, rabbis meet for peace in Spain

By DANNY WOOD
JTA

SEVILLE, Spain — It's not often that the keynote speakers at a conference speak openly about the possibility that the meeting will fail.

But speakers at the second World Congress of Rabbis and Imams for Peace, held last week in Seville, Spain, made it clear that if this year's event didn't lead to a concrete plan of action, it will have to be judged a failure.

The congress was the second time that more than 150 rabbis and imams have come together in the name of peace, with the last meeting held in Brussels. The group already is taking some small steps, such as examining textbooks used by Jewish and Muslim schools in Jerusalem to ensure that educational materials don't encourage intolerance.

At the conclusion, the congress' executive committee issued a statement condemning violence in the name of religion, with words that could be seen as a repudiation of anti-Jewish agitation by Hamas and Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

"We deplore any incitement against a faith or people, let alone any call for their elimination," the statement said.

The congress also called for respect for religious institutions, cemeteries, symbols and holy sites, and reaffirmed that "there is no inherent conflict between Islam and Judaism."

"One cannot exaggerate the importance of this event. Taking into account the backdrop of violence in Europe and ongoing conflict in the Holy Land, the very fact that we are meeting here is nearly a miracle," Shear Yeshuv Cohen, the chief rabbi of Haifa, said as the conference concluded March 22. "We will return to our communities to educate for peace and reconciliation, because that is what God wants from us."

Sheikh Imad al-Falouji, imam of Gaza and the senior Palestinian Authority figure at the conference, said, "Religious leaders must play a role to promote a culture of dialogue. We can impact on our political leaders to consider these values in their policy-making decisions."

The patrons of the event – the kings of Spain and Morocco – didn't attend the forum, but the Hommes de Paroles Foundation, which sponsored it, stressed that the delegates who attended carry enough weight in their communities to make a difference.

The aim of the conference is to make a positive contribution toward resolving religious conflict wherever it arises. According to the Jewish representative of Moroccan King Mohammed VI, Andre Azoulay, "the word of God has been kidnapped," and it's no longer enough for religious representatives to watch from the sidelines as religion is used by those who preach hatred.

Things got off to a strong start: Rather than wait for the workshop sessions, Israel's Ashkenazi chief rabbi, Yona Metzger, called at the opening ceremony for the formation of an international association of religious groups, a sort of United Nations of Religions.

There also were signs of mutual understanding. When Abdulaziz Othman, director general of the Islamic Educational Scientific and Cultural Organization angrily called for an international law to stop the publication of offensive material such as the cartoons of the Islamic prophet Muhammad that touched off violent riots throughout the Muslim world, Rabbi Michael Melchior, chief rabbi of Norway and a former Israeli cabinet minister, condemned disrespectful attacks on any faith.

There was a willingness on both sides to take some level of criticism. When an Israeli rabbi harangued Muslims for not standing up sufficiently to Osama bin Laden, imams in the audience listened respectfully.

But rather than presenting specific ideas for joint initiatives, many of the religious leaders still seemed to behave as if it were the first congress of this sort, proud that rabbis and imams were simply meeting and talking together.

Meanwhile, difficult and relevant questions often were swept aside.

On the issue of terrorism, the leaders condemned any act of violence in the name of religion. When pushed to comment on how this might apply to Palestinian suicide bombers, however, al-Falouji instead demanded that Israel change its policy toward the Palestinians.

When rabbis were asked to comment on the conditions that could lead to a sharing of the Holy Land, Rabbi Daniel Sperber from Bar-Ilan University in Israel, said that was an issue for politicians.

Tensions were never far from the surface, even over coffee, when al-Falouji argued with Stuart Altshuler, a rabbi from Orange County, Calif., over the status of Jerusalem and Israel's occupation of West Bank land the Palestinians claim.

Faced with difficult questions from journalists, the rabbis and imams often would respond with bromides about believing in the same god and how peace begins with dialogue.

To break down barriers, the organizers brought in a Philadelphia communications specialist. Wearing a cowboy hat and barking orders into his microphone, he encouraged the religious leaders to write down their "issues" on pieces of paper, then line up to announce them to the audience.

These "open sessions" became the focus of the conference. Rabbis and imams lined up to announce issues ranging from anti-Semitism in Iran to Islamophobia, from gender equality to Holocaust denial. The list was endless.

Rabbi Israel Singer, chairman of the World Jewish Congress' Policy Council, rejected the idea that Jewish-Muslim tensions lie at the root of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. He added that "religious crusaders" like Ahmadinejad "must be exposed for what they are: impostors."

One topic that came up repeatedly was the Muhammad cartoon controversy. The hope is that in the future, the interfaith group could act to defuse such tensions before they get out of hand

Hockey book aims to get boys reading

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A couple of generations ago, boys' books were all the rage. Chip Hilton, Bronc Burnett, Win Hadley, Tom Swift, and of course the classic Hardy Boys series thrilled adolescent boys with fast-paced adventures, camaraderie, sports and sleuthing.

Back then, it seems, boys enjoyed reading, whereas today, many can't seem to pull themselves away from the TV or computer monitor.

Sure, there's the Harry Potter series and lots of sci-fi, but if you're not interested in fantasy, then what?

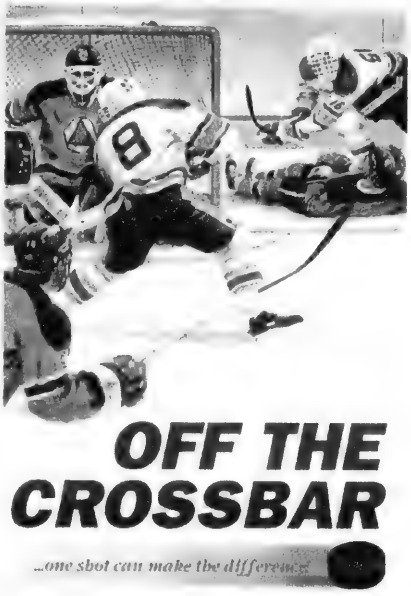
There is a crisis in reading among boys in the developmentally critical nine to 12 age range, believes author David Skuy, and it's reflected in the fact that after about age nine, girls' reading skills grow at a much faster rate than boys'. By high school, some 50 per cent of boys describe themselves as non-readers and in university, females outnumber males by a ratio of 60 to 40, he said.

Newsweek, he pointed out, recently ran a cover story describing the crisis in boys' education.

Skuy, who practises business law in Toronto, believes he can provide at least part of the solution. He recently penned Off the Crossbar (The Writers' Collective), an action-packed sports book aimed squarely at adolescent boys.

Set in the fictitious Canadian town of Terrence Falls, it follows the experiences of the new kid in town, Charlie Joyce, as he tries to fit in.

And fit in he does, primarily through hockey and other sports. A hockey tournament is the glue that binds the story together and carries it to its exciting conclusion. A longtime hockey player, Skuy includes lots of on-ice action, with a smattering of hockey diagrams and some practice drills and on-ice tips.



Along the way, Skuy addresses such issues as leadership, bullying, loss, fitting in at a new school, making new friends, how to deal with people who don't like you and other issues that resonate with youth.

"This is one of the few [books] explicitly aimed for boys," Skuy explained. "I tried to touch an issue that would relate to boys."

As a youngster, Skuy, 42, recalls being a voracious reader of the sports and adventure books mentioned above. He recalls it was an enriching part of his life and he feels boys who don't read much "are cheating themselves of a rich experience in life... They're losing out of what childhood could be."

David Skuy

For the book's protagonist, Charlie, sports helps him get through a difficult period in his life. "It's a fantastic outlet for working through problems, expressing themselves, making friends and belonging to a group." Those are the kind of elements that appeal to young boys, Skuy said.

Off the Crossbar is Skuy's first foray into writing fiction. In 2003 he wrote a book on modern French history.

At first, he said, his publisher was skeptical about a boys' book – it is, after all, a relatively weak market. But Skuy believes boys will read if they're given the right kind of book. Because hockey is the quintessential Canadian sport, he thinks Off the Crossbar will be a book that will interest them.

Off the Crossbar is available at Book City on Bloor Street, and through the Internet at ChaptersIndigo.ca and Amazon.ca. For more information or to read an excerpt from the book, visit Skuy's Web site at www.charliejoyce.com.

Balancing the child-physician role

By DR. MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

My 94-year-old father's fall and fractured hip was a disaster waiting to happen. My sister Diane and I had taken steps after it became clear last year that he could no longer safely bathe himself and that his walking was insecure. We convinced him to accept bathing help, which with some gentle coaxing worked out well, and we bought him a walker, which, he agreed, improved his ability to get around safely in his Chicago retirement home not far from where Diane, who is his primary family care provider, lives.

One morning, the call came. "Daddy's in the emergency department with a broken left hip. He will go for surgery, either today or tomorrow," Diane said. It was a Friday. I was able to get weekend coverage and managed to get an evening flight and went straight to the hospital. He had been admitted to the orthopedic floor after a number of hours. The attending internist felt he was in good medical shape for surgery, but wanted clearance from the cardiologist who had looked after him during his previous heart attack and successful by-pass surgery.

The orthopedic surgeon explained his plan, which made good medical sense to me. It balanced the surgical options and the desire to have as short a procedure as possible with early mobilization. Having previously done a lot of geriatric medical consultations on orthopedic patients, I felt comfortable letting things unfold according to the outlined plan, and Diane and I felt confident in the surgeon.

The next morning, we arrived in good time to see our father off to surgery. Time passed and he was not taken to the operating room as scheduled. We were informed that the procedure was cancelled and eventually the orthopedic surgeon and internist explained that he was inadvertently given 10 times the stated dose for one of his cardiac medications. There was no real danger to his medical status, but it was felt that the surgery was better postponed for a day. The next morning, the procedure was done with no apparent problems. I returned home while my father was still recovering from his surgery, but was awake and could converse with me.

Since then, my challenge, along with a number of visits to Chicago, has been to balance my physician and family roles while assisting my sister with her observations without imposing my medical status on those responsible for his care.

At one point, when Diane and I felt the members of the rehabilitation team were failing to acknowledge and address substantial medical issues that were interfering with his progress, and were thinking of early discharge because he had reached a "plateau," I put on my "medical" hat.

I wrote as diplomatic a letter as possible to the head of the department outlining our concerns about some aspects of the care my father had received and I expressed concern that many of his problems could be rectified if his needs were better addressed within a geriatric patient framework. It was a gamble, but I couched the letter with acknowledgement and praise of the team's efforts, yet also pointed out areas where I felt there was potentially greater optimism for the outcome.

It seemed to work. The team's response was positive and supportive. Gradually, many of the issues were addressed. Diane and I are hopeful that our father will return to a reasonable level of functioning, but we're also realistic that he might require more daily care.

Balancing one's professional role with being a loving child can be challenging, but if done well, it can lead to a positive outcome and a responsive reaction from the treating staff.

Apricot-Pistachio Charoset

This recipe produces a slightly dry, chunky charoset. If you prefer a more moist version, add extra wine, a tablespoon at a time, until you achieve the desired consistency.

1 cup minced dried apricots
1 cup unsalted shelled White pistachio nuts, chopped and lightly toasted
1/3 cup sweet white wine
1 tblsp. + 1 tsp. fresh lemon juice
1 tblsps. shredded fresh mint
10 threads saffron, crumbled

In large bowl, combine all ingredients and mix well. Wait approximately 20 minutes before serving to allow apricots to absorb liquid.
Makes about 2 cups.

Purim and Pesach offer adult lessons, too

Seymour Epstein

I often wonder during this period between Purim and Pesach whether the diet I'm on is some vestige of a Jewish origin for Catholic Lent. Surely, our ancestors also ate more and exercised less during the Judean winter of long ago, and then followed that with the required Purim excess, only to realize that the eating spree of Pesach was a mere four weeks away. Somewhere along the line, the early Christians must have copied what they thought was spiritual abstinence.

This period, if used for reflection, offers yet another illustration of the dangers of "pediatric Judaism" and of the great potential in an adult understanding of Jewish life. In our desire to make the holiday cycle meaningful to children, it's all too simple to reduce both Purim and Pesach to children's games that adults can reject or ignore with ease.

Purim is a complex holiday that has perplexed us as a people since we first read and commented on Megillat Esther. If, indeed, it were but a simple victory for the Jewish inhabitants of Persia, why is God missing from this biblical tale? Why do the Jews celebrate with a drinking party that is so much like those of the foolish king? Why are we taught by the rabbis to so intoxicate ourselves that we confuse the villain with the hero? There, are, of course, a variety of good answers to these questions, and they are what make Purim much more than a black-and-white children's tale.

The rote questions of the Haggadah and their printed answers are also deceivingly simple. They are part of a wonderful pageant technique in which, to better teach our children, we speak, sing, eat, gesticulate, and drink the Exodus from slavery to freedom. But, anyone who has delved deeper into the original texts of the Exodus, as well as the rabbinic commentaries and the supra-commentaries on the Haggadah, knows that there is much more beneath the surface of this holiday than what we give as answers to our young children.

We adults can use this time to do more than diet and clean our houses. We can rededicate ourselves to a mature quest for meaning in our ancient traditions.

And Miriam drummed

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Whoosh! The waves of the sea cascaded back. The Jewish people were free and celebrating their emancipation, led by Moses and his sister, Miriam. Moses sang. Miriam danced and drummed. The Torah states: Miriam "picked up a hand drum and all the women went out after her in dance with hand drums." (Exodus 15:20).

According to commentary, Miriam's use of dancing and drumming had such an effect on the Children of Israel (B'nai Yisrael) that the miracle did not remain an event tainted by pain and trepidation, but instead became one of jubilation.

Recently, I participated in a drumming course conducted by Torontonian Terri Segal, 27, an expressive-arts facilitator who shares the benefits of creative expression through group drumming and expressive-arts workshops.

She is a vibrant teacher who introduced me to the authority of the drum and helped me understand Miriam's decision to pound "the skins" in a bid to gather and excite the B'nai Yisrael. One evening a week for eight weeks, participants followed Terri's clear and gentle instruction. We learned the art of tapping versus pounding, and how to draw out a meaningful and hauntingly rich bass sound augmented with an echoed treble beat.

Terri taught us African drumming basics as well as aspects of the drumming culture.

The drum has been used historically for rites of passage and celebration. It is also used to calm and focus people with Alzheimer's disease, emotionally disturbed teens, children who have autism, prisoners and the homeless population.

A 1996 Newsweek cover story titled Your Child's Brain presented strong data on the brain's fundamental need for rhythm, and noted that stress is caused when we are deprived of it because we are disconnecting from our deeper selves. Shamans of indigenous cultures have used the drum for years as a tool to retrieve parts of the soul that have been mislaid.

Barry Quinn, a clinical psychologist specializing in neuro-biofeedback for stress management, said drumming for brief periods can actually change brain-wave patterns, dramatically reducing stress. He calls the results of 30 to 40 minutes of drumming on his highest-stress clients, "by far the most amazing results I've encountered thus far in my research."

Being a member of Terri's class gave me the opportunity to live out a lifelong dream… I was jamming, kicking back and rocking with other musicians. In a very basic but potent way, the group expressed the "music in me," our hands zestfully pounding on the West African djembe drum. Our eyes rolled. Our heads bopped. We brought the house down. We were rocking!

Terri is an earthy woman whose method of teaching is inviting and exciting. She has an innate ability to make participants feel like musicians, even those who were off beat and out of step. On those nights, I was a Jewish babatunde olatunji (Nigerian drumming master); I was a musican and my heart was beating loudly.

A fetus' heart learns to beat by pulsing to its mother's heart. The heart is the only organ with a pulse beat, setting the rhythmic relationship for all other organs. Perhaps Miriam knew this when she encouraged the B'nai Yisrael to join her in drumming, following the fusion of the sea waters. Like Miriam, Terri seemed acutely aware of the connection between the heart and the beat of the drum.

Two passionate women. Two awesome jam sessions. One 4,000 years ago in the desert, and the other two weeks ago in Toronto. Rock on!

Canada halts funding to Hamas-led PA

CJN News Services

OTTAWA — Canada last week became the first donor country to cut funding and diplomatic ties to the Palestinian Authority (PA) just as the new Hamas-led government was being sworn in.

Following through on a pre-election promise to review aid to the PA and a statement to the same effect made even before Canada's Conservative-led minority government was sworn into office – federal officials cut aid over the new Hamas government's refusal to renounce the use of terror and recognize Israel.

However, the Tories say they will still channel humanitarian aid to Palestinians through the United Nations, as well as other agencies and non-governmental organizations.

"Not a red cent to Hamas," Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay said on CBC's Inside Politics program last Wednesday.

"This is a terrorist organization. They have to change," he said. "We cannot send any direct aid to an organization that refuses to renounce terrorist activity, refuses to renounce violence."

His certitude was repeated following a meeting with the Conservative caucus: "There will be no contact and no funds, period."

That means Canada will suspend $7.3 million in funding – almost one-third of the $25 million a year this country spends in aid in the West Bank and Gaza.

Another $10 million per year will continue to flow to the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East (UNRWA) through the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA).

In October 2004, Canada said it would continue to fund UNRWA even after its head admitted that some of its employees were Hamas members.

"We do intend to continue, to the best degree possible, to directly fund the Palestinian people through humanitarian aid and that is more so under the auspices of CIDA," MacKay told reporters.

In a statement, the foreign affairs minister said the "stated platform of [the Hamas] government has not addressed the concerns raised by Canada and others concerning non-violence, the recognition of Israel, and acceptance of

Choosing An 'Envoy'

MONTREAL — Students from Hillel Montreal and the University of Ottawa's Jewish Students' Association-Hillel were among 500 students at 19 schools in Russia, Ukraine, North America and South America to vote for Israel's next unofficial "ambassador" to the United States. Hillel partnered with the reality show The Ambassador, now in its second season in Israel, to help narrow its field of candidates from six to two. The hit show has 14 young Israelis vying to represent Israel in a series of PR and diplomacy challenges. The students voted on which hopeful made the best pro-Israel PR video. Hillel Montreal was also one of five locations to host crews that recorded students' debates and voting. The footage airs this spring.

Shoah Workshop Held

REGINA - The Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario last week presented a one-day workshop on teaching the Holocaust to student teachers at the University of Regina. The workshop was a follow-up to the March of the Living program in Poland, in which two student teachers from the school took part. The seminar, geared to high school teachers, featured two Holocaust survivors, Max Eisen and Vera Schiff, who spoke about their wartime experiences.

WORLD

Iranian Jews Visit

MOSCOW — Fifteen Iranian Jewish women from an amateur folk group were in Moscow last week after being invited to take part in the Light a Candle Jewish children's arts festival. The women, aged 14 to 30, were invited to Russia by Arkady Gaidamak, a Jewish leader and business tycoon, and came with a special permission from Iranian authorities. They performed Iranian and Kurdish folk music and were to be joined by Sarun Yashaie, head of Tehran's Jewish community, who was to attend a special reception for the group at the Moscow Choral Synagogue.

Prince Goes to Shul

SAO PAULO — Jordanian Prince Hassan Bin Talal was welcomed at Latin America's largest synagogue earlier this month. He was received by Rabbi Henry Sobel for breakfast at the 2,000-family Congregacao Israelita Paulista in Sao Paulo. Several Jewish and Muslim officials also attended. Talal and Rabbi Sobel prayed together in Hebrew and Arabic. "In Brazil we live in harmony, and it's our duty to export tolerance and mutual respect to all parts of the world," the rabbi said.

Jewish Chief of Staff

WASHINGTON — U.S. President George W. Bush named Joshua Bolten, 51, as his chief of staff last week, replacing Andrew Card, who resigned last week. Bolten, who is Jewish, had been director of the Office of Management and Budget for three years. He takes over as Bush's approval ratings have fallen to new lows.

Attacker Sentenced

MOSCOW — A Russian convicted of a stabbing spree at a Moscow shul got a 13-year prison sentence. A Moscow court jailed Alexander Koptsev last week after finding him guilty of racially motivated attempted murder. He wounded nine Jews in the Jan. 11 attack before being overpowered. Prosecutors had sought a 16-year term. A separate charge against Koptsev of stirring up ethnic hatred was dropped.

School Funding Drive

CHICAGO — Chicago's Jewish Federation has started a funding drive to raise $50 million (US) for Chicago area Jewish days schools called the Jewish Day School Guaranty Trust. To get money quickly to schools with pressing needs, trust income will be "front-loaded" – funds may come in over a decade, but interest on the sum will be paid to schools up front. The federation is borrowing up to $40 million to enable the front-loading. It's also offering a 10 per cent match on gifts through 2007. The first gift was a $1-million donation from the Hochberg and Lowenstein families, who helped start the program.

Jewish Books Distributed in Nigeria

ABUJA, Nigeria — The Philadelphia-based Jewish Publication Society is distributing almost 3,000 pounds of Jewish books to a community in Nigeria that some consider Jewish.

The shipment for the Igbo Bnei Israel arrived in February and is being distributed in five Nigerian provinces. The books include Hebrew-English Bibles, as well as English-language books on Jewish topics. The donations are part of the JPS Mitzvah Project, which sends slightly damaged Jewish books to communities around the world.

The Nigerian program was co-ordinated with Rabbi Howard Gorin of Congregation Tikvat Israel in Rockville, Md., and Kulanu, a grassroots group that helps underserved Jewish communities. The Igbo Bnei Israel's claim to Jewish status is not recognized by Israel, but it is accepted by some international Jewish groups.

Israelis comprise 25% of Jews in the GTA

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

More than 50,000 immigrants from the State of Israel currently reside in the Greater Toronto Area, comprising some 25 per cent of the GTA's Jewish population, a new demographic study reveals.

Nearly 2,700 Israelis immigrated to Canada in 2004 and 2,601 arrived the year before – the two highest numbers on record – states the report, titled The Israeli Community in the Greater Toronto Area.

Prepared by David Gidron for the Israeli House, a component of the Israeli Consulate in Toronto, the study found that altogether, 64,859 Israelis immigrated to Canada from 1946 to 2004, with the vast majority settling in the GTA. That figure does not include children born in Canada.

Ties between Israeli immigrants and the established Jewish community remain tenuous. In the report, Gidron calls on Jewish community leadership "to find ways to strengthen the connection to this group… Some of the Jewish bodies – especially the bodies connected to Jewish education – are, in my opinion, moving too slowly and are having difficulty in finding solutions to the needs of the Israeli community. It is important that these bodies put the Israeli issues on their agenda in order to help ensure we don't lose the next generation, the children."

A copy of the report has been turned over to the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and it is now being studied. The report was prepared to assist the Israeli House in planning the kind of services it would offer Israeli expats and to provide the Israeli Canadian Forum, a new organization that will serve as an umbrella organization for Israelis, with information about their target audience. The study is based on Canadian census data, information compiled by the consulate and on material found in Citizenship and Immigration Canada reports.

Gidron believes integrating Israeli newcomers will pose a challenge to the established Jewish community on a number of fronts, but the new, relatively young population group also offers tremendous opportunities for community growth. A community-wide "very serious dialogue" is needed, he said

Posing one difficulty is the cultural divide: many Israelis perceive Canadian Jews as too formal, cool and standoffish.

Another point of separation is religious identity: Canadian Jews' connection to the community and to their Jewishness is often through synagogue affiliation. Most Israelis, however, are secular. "They look at Jewishness first from the point of nationalism and ethnic identity and less from the point of view of religion," Gidron said. "It will take years, if ever, to see Israelis migrate to shuls."

Gidron said he is concerned about Jewish continuity among youths whose parents are Israeli. "They aren't in day schools and they are not tied to Israel, the land, as they are not living there. That's a major challenge for anyone who works for the community."

Gidron, who moved to Toronto two years ago, said Israeli immigrants are forced to address the universal Jewish dilemma of continuity – but with a twist. "In Israel, they do not deal with the question of what it is to be a Jew. They come here and for the first time, they have to give thought to that question."

Some of the report's other findings:

- The largest concentration of Israeli immigrants in the GTA is in Vaughan (2,840), a city immediately north of Toronto. Second is the area around Finch (1,150) and third the area around Lawrence (670).
- Two-thirds of the Israeli community earn less than $40,000 per year. Israeli immigrants are relatively young compared to other groups of Jews and most have arrived in the last few years, keeping their incomes low.
- Sixty-nine per cent of Israelis are salaried workers, while only 1.6 per cent receive a government pension. 7.23 per cent receive government assistance.
- 14.5 per cent live in poverty.

Zichron Yaakov literature

From the editor's desk

The history of modern Israel did not actually begin with the Palestinian intifadah of 1987, nor with the widely cheered appearance of the much-adored, keffiyah-clad, gun-toting, sunglass-hidden Yasser Arafat before the United Nations General Assembly some 13 years before that.

Indeed, for most of recorded Jewish life in the Holy Land since the start of the Common Era, Jews have lived in the four "holy cities" of Jerusalem, Hebron, Safed and Tiberius. But Jews found their way to the Holy Land much more recently, at the beginning of the last century when the eastern edge of the Mediterranean was nothing but a dusty, neglected outpost of the Ottoman Empire.

There is also more to the sights, sounds and smells of Israel than the ubiquitous images of conflict and strife and the black, smoky photos of the burning tires of Palestinian protest. Israel is an explorer's garden of limitless offerings of climatic, geographic, topographic, archeological and other delights.

But very few people outside of Israel are familiar with either its modern history or its resplendent, remarkably diverse, natural beauty.

Two books, A Strange Death by Hillel Halkin (Public Affairs, New York, 2005) and Mandrakes from the Holy Land by Aharon Megged (The Toby Press, 2005) are a remedy, or at least, a beginning of a remedy, for that lack of familiarity.

Halkin and Megged are two of Israel's most powerful and masterful writers, essayists and novelists. Both are award-winning authors, superb storytellers with uncommonly descriptive powers of observation.

Though the two works spin vastly different narratives, they both revolve around the early, quaint community of Zichron Yaakov (In Jacob's Memory), the settlement founded in 1882 by Baron Edmond de Rothschild and named after his father Jacob.

Halkin's work is a playful, thoughtful, fascinating blend of autobiography, history and narrative.

Using his own family's arrival in Zichron Yaakov in the early 1970s, the then somewhat sleepy little town on the verdant, wine-rich steppes below the Carmel mountain range just off the Tel Aviv-Haifa highway, Halkin discovers a possible murder mystery at the very heart of the town's storied history.

The famous Aaronsohn family and the fabled NILI spy ring in which at least one of the family was involved during the World War I struggle of the British against the Turks, is at the centre of the mystery.

In the best forensic fashion, Halkin uncovers and interprets clue after clue related to a certain "strange death" in the wake of the execution of two of the NILI spies and the suicide of the exotic and beautiful Sarah Aaronsohn, a member of the spy ring.

Halkin introduces us to a colourful cast of veteran Zichron Yaakov characters. He recreates conversations with a stenographer's precision, and he describes his travels and experiences in the adjacent countryside with an impressionist painter's gravitas for colour and light. He paints a captivating, richly detailed picture of life in the Holy Land for its Jews, beginning in pre-mandatory Palestine at the turn of the last century under the rule of the Turks. It is a fun, illuminating glimpse of a time not-so-long-ago past in Eretz Yisrael, before the rise of Arab (Palestinian) nationalism.

Megged's book, translated from the Hebrew by Sondra Silverston, first appeared in 1998 as Duda'im Min Ha'aretz Hakedosha.

It is a typical Megged tour de force. Told in the format of correspondence written in 1906, primarily by the protagonist, Beatrice Campbell-Bennett, a young English artist travelling through the country on a mission to paint its flowers, the story is a multi-layered narrative that excavates the interconnected strata of Zionist history, theology, spiritual quest, psychological dysfunction and geographic travelogue.

Campbell-Bennett befriends and becomes the guest of the Aaronsohns of Zichron Ya'akov and they serve as her social anchor. But they cannot save her from the travails that unfold. She is a complicated, troubled individual whose artistry mixes with and emerges from her ecstatic religious vulnerabilities. She focuses her artistic search on finding and painting mandrakes, the aphrodisiacal fruit mentioned in the bible. Ultimately, her emotional equilibrium destabilizes, even as the efforts of her family to "heal" her from afar intensify.

Campbell-Bennett's experiences are the pinwheel through which Megged shines a constantly changing shower of historical and geographic light. He adorns his book with openly, unself-conscious affection for the compelling beauty of the land.

These two books are excellent company for anyone wanting to learn about the history of Eretz Yisrael at the turn of the last century. –MBD

USDS parents angry they weren't told about mould

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Parents of children at United Synagogue Day School's Richmond Hill branch are angry that they were only notified a little more than a week ago about mould found in two classrooms last fall, and that junior and senior kindergarten kids in the affected rooms were only moved elsewhere in the building after parents learned of the problem.

As of last Wednesday, 56 parents had signed a petition circulated that morning calling for the resignation of the school's board president, Allen Gales, and head of school Lucy Cohen.

At a meeting that evening, public apologies from Gales, Cohen, and school administrator Sue Walsh – as well as a promise to repair the damage over the Passover break – did little to appease parents, who accused the three of negligence after seeing copies of a Nov. 29 report by consultants Pinchin Environmental Ltd. The report was commissioned by the school to assess water damage after heavy rains.

The written report included eight recommendations, among them to "communicate the results" to occupants and the workplace health and safety committee, to refer sensitive individuals or those with certain health problems for medical assessment, and to remove and dispose of the lower four feet of drywall, insulation and vapour barrier in two offices and two preschool classrooms.

"You did not implement one recommendation that these professionals made," said Jonathon Kahane-Rapport, who has two children at the school, neither of whom is in an affected class. "It's time to go. You're done… When it comes to the health and safety of our children, you can't take chances.

"You've got a pregnant receptionist downstairs," he added.

"You have jeopardized our children's health," shouted Jonathan Flatt, a parent who, ironically, has a business that specializes in mould removal.

The building, located at Bayview and Weldrick avenues, has been sold to a developer, and USDS will close the branch after this school year, which prompted some parents to speculate that that is the reason the repairs have not been made. The school also has branches at Beth Tikvah Synagogue and Beth Tzedec Congregation.

Last Friday, a letter from Gales and Cohen was distributed to USDS parents. It outlined the situation and said the school is "immediately embarking on changing our procedures, in consultation with parents" to prevent a recurrence. Parents and teachers were invited to contact them this week if they want to become involved.

Remediation work is scheduled for Passover and will be done in consultation with a "parent [Flatt] experienced in this field," the letter stated.

At the meeting, Gales said that, based on conversations with Pinchin representatives before the written report was received, "our understanding was that there was a minor amount of mould… and that in the spring, before Passover, we should have it reassessed."

"It was our understanding that there was no immediate issue of safety or concern," Walsh added.

"When the report came in, it wasn't viewed as seriously [as it would have been] in terms of going through page by page of the report, because we had already received a verbal on it," said Gales.

"We exercised bad judgment," he admitted.

A Pinchin representative attended the meeting and confirmed that the extent of the mould was "relatively minor we'd estimate no more than 10 to 20 square feet." It could probably be dealt with in a weekend, he added.

"Nowhere in this report do I see that it can wait four months," one angry father said at the meeting.

"My daughter has been coming home for a month with bumps all over her body, scratching," said an irate mother, standing up to address the school representatives. "I'm pumping her full of Benadryl because I don't know what the cause is. Well, guess what? Now I know!"

"I have a son with a mould allergy and another son that's had asthma all year," yelled another parent. "It's not acceptable."

School promises repairs over Passover break

Ellin Bessner, who has a son in USDS' senior kindergarten and one in Beit Rayim Synagogue's afternoon Hebrew school in the same building, said at the meeting that the Hebrew school "was never told. The principal found out from me!"

The synagogue rents space from USDS for both its congregation and its Hebrew school.

Parents demanded to know who was responsible for the decision not to relay the results of the assessment, and they did not accept Gales' initial answer of "the school."

"The three of us are taking responsibility," Cohen said.

Michael Kulik, who has a six-year-old and a four-year-old at the school, told Gales, Cohen and Walsh, "I think you have a responsibility to the parents and the community in general to present a case to us about why it's reasonable that we should accept no resignations, no changing of the guard, no shifting of responsibilities."

Some parents expressed hesitation about re-enrolling their children in the school.

"This isn't over," said Bessner the day after the meeting.

She added Monday morning that, while she appreciates that the work will be done, "somebody has to be held accountable."

Toronto family's mezuzah egged by vandals

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A weekend jaunt to Niagara Falls ended in a "sickening feeling" for Nathan and Shari Brown when they were greeted on their return by what appeared to be an anti-Semitic attack on their home.

The couple were returning with their two children to their house on Fairlawn Avenue in the Avenue Road and Lawrence Avenue area to find their front door mezuzah had been struck with several raw eggs. No other part of the house was touched.

"It was very upsetting," Shari said a day later. "We felt very violated. My son is very sensitive and he felt very sad inside."

The incident likely took place late on the evening of March 25, a Saturday, or on the morning of March 26, a Sunday. The Browns' housekeeper, Maria Santos, discovered the egging when she dropped by to feed the couple's dog on Sunday. She didn't inform the Browns so as not to disturb their outing.

"I'm not Jewish but I respect everybody's religion," Santos said. "It's sad. The egg went straight to the mezuzah."

Nathan said there were plenty of targets for a vandal to hit without aiming for the mezuzah. Whoever egged the house would have had to walk up several stairs to get close enough to hit the religious symbol, suggesting it wasn't a random act of throwing eggs from the street.

"It's just a sickening feeling," Nathan said.

Shari said the couples' nine-year-old son, Jakob, was particularly shaken. "He had this look of shock," she said. "He is very sensitive. He didn't know why anyone would do that to us… He's scared that someone did this to us."

Sgt. Lino Murarotto of 32 Division said the incident is under investigation and it's too early to determine whether it's a hate crime.

Detectives "haven't determined the motive yet. We have since discovered that other properties may have been damaged on Fairlawn Avenue," Murarotto added.

According to the Toronto Police Service's 2005 Annual Hate/Bias Crime Statistical Report, Jews along with blacks were the most frequently targeted group.

A total of 132 hate crimes were reported in 2005 – 19 per cent less than the year before – of which 33 involved Jews, the report stated.

B'nai Brith reported recently in its 2005 Audit of Antisemitic Incidents that Jews in the Greater Toronto Area were targeted in 544 incidents – a 2.6 per cent increase over 2004 – but that cases of vandalism dropped from the year before.

The discrepancy between the police and B'nai Brith statistics is due in part to the criteria for recording incidents. Police limit their reporting to cases that could be considered crimes. B'nai Brith does not limit its reporting to criminal occurrences.

The mezuzah on Nathan and Shari Brown's home was vandalized when they recently went away.

UJA Federation/Jewish Foundation team up with MASA for new educational journey

By Daniel Horowitz
UJA Federation

An innovative and unprecedented opportunity for Jewish students from around the world is underway, and it promises to not only connect Jewish youth to their roots in Israel – but to a brighter future, as well.

MASA, which means "journey" in English, is a joint venture of the Government of Israel, the Jewish Agency for Israel (UJA Federation's overseas partner) and Jewish Federations across North America – and was created to connect Jewish youth with their history and with their roots.

The mandate of MASA is to bring 20,000 young Jews from around the world each year for anywhere from one semester to a year-long program of studying and volunteering in Israel. Qualifying students have more than 140 programs to choose from.

And now, thanks to the generosity and vision of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto donors, and its endowment arm, the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, as well as a new partnership with the Israeli government and JAFI, Canadian Jewish students have the opportunity to take advantage of this life-altering opportunity.

"We are excited that this year applicants will have the opportunity to benefit from this wonderful new initiative," enthuses Dani Fine of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education. "In essence, with the advent of this new partnership, we are collectively creating increased scholarship capacity for Canadian students. We are creating the chance for them to participate in exciting and enriching long-term Israel programs and experiences. In fact, through scholarship funds currently established with the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, over 200 post-secondary school scholarships are awarded to Canadian students annually. Now, with this partnership, that number will quickly increase at an impressive rate."

"Where the incredibly successful and visionary birthright israel initiative was our children's first love affair with Israel, MASA is the more mature, long-term commitment with her," says Julia Koschitzky, a leader of Toronto's Jewish community and the co-chair of JAFI's educational department. "Ariel Sharon was so thrilled and excited about MASA; in fact, I was with him in Israel last May when it was launched. Studies have shown that those young Jewish men and women - between the ages of 18 and 26 - who spend time in Israel are more likely to become Jewish community leaders, and many, ultimately, make aliyah. MASA will create Jewish leaders; it will connect the disconnected with their roots. This incredible project is essential because not only will it enhance our collective future as Jews, it will guarantee that future."

The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto and UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education offers students scholarship opportunities.

Harper's resolute stance

Apologists for Hamas base their defence of the terrorist organization on the fact that it was democratically elected by a majority of Palestinians to form their government. They essentially claim that the group's uncompromising, oft-repeated, religiously based commitment to Israel's obliteration is merely an inconvenient detail in an otherwise laudable, democratic outcome.

But since when, in the history of relations between and among nations, does the fact of an election outweigh in any significant respect the policies and purposes of the party winning that election?

Surely, there cannot now be even the slightest doubt regarding Hamas' self-defining purpose-above-all-other-purposes. Indeed, Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar last weekend conveniently reminded the world what it is. "[I] dreamed of hanging a huge map of the world on the wall at my Gaza home which does not show Israel on it," he told the China View news service. "I hope that our dream to have our independent state on all historic Palestine, including Israel, will become real one day. I'm certain of this because there is no place for the state of Israel on this land," he added.

To maintain business-as-usual with Hamas, whose policies are nothing more than openly proclaimed protocols for Israel's extinction would mean endorsing those protocols. Thus, we are proud of Prime Minister Stephen Harper's important decision last week to suspend foreign aid and diplomatic relations with the Hamas government. But pride is beside the point. The affirmation of the bedrock values of our way of life – decency, civility, non-violence and the paramount value of all living souls – is the real point. Politicide and genocide must never be countenanced as valid national policies, even if espoused by a democratically elected government. We commend and thank the government of Canada for its exemplary, principled decision.

Olmert's difficult road

Phase 1 of the Israel general elections is complete. The voters have indicated their preferences for representation in the Knesset from among the 31 parties that offered themselves to the electorate. Ehud Olmert's Kadima party won the most votes of any party, but garnered less than 25 per cent of the total. Twenty-nine members of his party will sit in the Knesset. The remaining 91 of the 120-member chamber come from 11 other party lists. No single party received a resounding endorsement for its policies or personalities, although some parties, most notably the Likud, which elected only 12 members, did suffer a resounding rebuke.

Olmert has been asked to form the government. As the road ahead for the small Jewish state is a difficult one, it is incumbent upon him to ensure that the second phase of the election – coalition-building – will be effected openly, transparently and with urgent priority given to the need to build the widest possible national consensus.

Tajikistan synagogue destroyed

The Tajikistan government has destroyed the country's only synagogue, in the capital city, Dushanbe. This has been reported by the BBC and the Associated Press but has gone unreported in the Canadian media.

The century-old synagogue, located near the city centre, was bulldozed without warning, in February, to make way for a new presidential residence. Government officials have offered the city's 300-member Jewish community a remote parcel of land but no compensation for the demolished buildings.

Tajikistan is a secular republic of seven million people, most of them Muslim. There is no Tajikistan embassy in Ottawa. Canada, however, maintains an embassy in Kazakhstan that is also accredited to Tajikistan.

Canada provides aid to Tajikistan through the Canadian International Development Agency. We should raise our objections in this matter with the Tajikistan government.

Israeli politicians and Diaspora Jews

The letter from the Alliance of Concerned Jewish Canadians, "Group opposes Israeli government policies," was published in the CJN on March 9. Since my name was attached to that letter, it presumably falls on me to reply to those who have written in, though I was by no means the sole author.

The relationship between Israel and the Diaspora, which we raised in our recent statement, can be deeply troubling to Canadian Jews. It is interesting that the letters responding to our statement, from Toronto, Bracebridge, Ont., and Montreal (CJN, March 16 and 23) focused on our contention that Israel attempts to speak in the name of Diaspora Jews. Many Israeli politicians do think they have every right to speak and act for us. Often enough, depending on the circumstances and the zealousness of the politician concerned, this mindset turns up in their speeches. I submit the following example from a speech of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on May 22, 2005: "Our fight was the fight of Jews everywhere. That we were fighting for our sisters and brothers across the sea, as much as for… our grandchildren yet to be born. They reassured us that the entire Jewish world was an interconnected whole."

In the past, such statements were usually dismissed as harmless rhetoric, but in recent years Israel's policies in the occupied territories have aroused widespread indignation. This resentment and anger is directed against Israelis and even to Jews in the Diaspora, who unfortunately are deemed to give unconditional support to Israeli policies. But many Canadian Jews oppose the occupation, and those of us who think that way proclaim our right not to be associated with it and ask our leaders to acknowledge our legitimate dissent.

Embarrassing Diaspora Jews

Michael Benazon and Michael Mandel, plus 30 co-signatories, would want the government of Israel to make decisions and policy for the survival of six million Israelis based on not embarrassing Jews living in comfort in Canada, United States, United Kingdom, France, South Africa, etc. ("Group opposes Israeli government policies," letter, CJN, March 9). Even if it may endanger Israel's very existence, the government should not rock the boat and embarrass us in the Diaspora.

Shame on all of you for not being concerned Jews and only concerned about being Canadian Jews.

How can we justify the bickering?

Responses to the letter from Concerned Jewish Citizens have been unduly harsh ("Group opposes Israeli government policies," letter, CJN, March 9). One ("Jewish Canadian and Israeli policies", CJN, March 16) argued that Jewish people who do not live in Israel shouldn't have a say in Israeli foreign policy, just as Italians living outside of their country shouldn't have a say in what goes on in Italy. But it is isn't the same. Every Jew is an honorary citizen of Israel; every Jew watches Israel with bated breath, wondering when it will be taken away. Another letter calls the authors of the Concerned Jewish Citizens letter self-loathing and condemns them for uttering a word of criticism against the Israeli government ("Reply to 'Concerned Jewish Canadians,1,'" CJN, March 30). A third letter ("Reply to 'Concerned Jewish Canadians, 2,'" Montreal letter, CJN, March 30) expresses the whole situation in exclusively military terms, as though ordinary citizens should never have anything to say about government affairs.

What is happening to our native affinity for logic and enlightening exchange? It is mostly through the enduring strength and creativity of Jewish contemplation that we managed to survive centuries of horrific persecution. How can we justify this bickering, this base refusal to engage in a meaningful, diplomatic investigation of what we may be doing wrong in Israel?

Kadima's slim victory moves Israel to centre

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

A major shift in Israeli politics was cemented this week, with Ehud Olmert's centrist Kadima Party poised to form the next government.

The party didn't fare as well as expected in last Tuesday's elections, but Olmert is likely to be able to form a solid majority in the Knesset, allowing him to move ahead with his stated intention of further withdrawal from the West Bank.

The elections, the first since Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's abrupt departure from the Israeli political scene, were seen in large part as a referendum on the withdrawal proposal.

As is often the case in Israeli politics, there were surprises. The biggest were Kadima's weaker-than-expected showing; the emergence of the hard-line Yisrael Beiteinu as the fourth-largest party; and the strong showing of a newcomer, the Pensioners party, which hadn't been expected to win any seats.

The final vote has Kadima with 29 seats, the left-leaning Labor with 20 seats and the right-wing Likud party 12.

Yisrael Beiteinu, which drew significant Russian support, garnered 11 seats. Shas, an Orthodox party that appeals to Sephardi voters, got 12 seats, and United Torah Judaism, another fervently Orthodox party, won six seats. The hawkish National Union-National Religious party got nine seats.

The Pensioners, led by 79-year-old former Mossad agent Rafi Eitan, appealed to senior citizens with its focus on benefits for the elderly and won seven seats. The mostly Arab parties won nine seats.

Voter turnout was 63 per cent, by far the lowest in Israel's history.

Most significantly, the centre-left parties Kadima, Labor, the Pensioners and Meretz, which got five seats, and the Arab lists – together have 69 seats in the 120-member Knesset.

But it is possible that Shas could join an Olmert-led coalition.

So how did Kadima win?

For one, Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu's scare tactics – raising the spectre of an Iran-supported, fundamentalist, Hamas-led Palestinian entity on Israel's doorstep – backfired. Those he frightened didn't necessarily see him as the leader best equipped to deal with the threat, and many of them voted for parties further right, such as Yisrael Beiteinu.

Under the leadership of Avigdor Lieberman, who immigrated in 1978 from Moldova, Yisrael Beiteinu is a hawkish party with an immigrant-rights focus. The party backs Olmert's proposed West Bank withdrawal in order to separate Israelis and Palestinians, but also proposes redrawing Israel's border to exclude large numbers of Israeli Arabs who live close to Palestinian areas.

Many other Israeli voters moved to the centre, backing Olmert's plan for unilateral disengagement from the Palestinians as the most rational way of dealing with the threat from a Hamas-led Palestinian Authority.

Likud lost much of its traditional Sephardi working-class base to Labor, with its strong socio-economic message, but Labor lost even more of its middle-class Ashkenazi voters to Kadima and the Pensioners.

The final election results make Olmert a prime minister with wide coalition options.

He has made support for his plan to establish new borders between Israel and the Palestinians a condition for joining his coalition. That rules out the hawkish National Union-National Religious party and Likud, and makes Labor the most natural coalition partner.

Around the Kadima-Labor core, Olmert will be able to choose one or more additional coalition partners from the Pensioners, Meretz, Yisrael Beiteinu, Shas and United Torah Judaism.

Ideally, he would like to achieve a balance between left and right and between secular and religious parties. That would entail a broad-based coalition of 70-90 Knesset seats.

Whatever form the coalition eventually takes, Olmert will have a clear majority in the Knesset for his plan for separation from the Palestinians, which is likely to become the centrepiece of his new administration.

Because Olmert made his intentions crystal-clear before the elections, right-wing opponents of the plan won't be able to demand a referendum on the grounds that he misled the nation, as they did with Sharon's pullout from Gaza last year.

To a large extent, the election itself was a referendum on the withdrawal plan. It calls for a large-scale Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank and the establishment of permanent borders with the Palestinians within four years, by negotiation if possible and unilaterally if not. The plan is certain to dominate the political agenda in the new Knesset's term.

The second major item in the government guidelines will be the administration's socio-economic agenda.

As the price for bringing Labor into the government, Labor leader Amir Peretz will make a number of key socio-economic demands, including raising the minimum wage from $730 (US) to $1,000 a month, providing pensions for all and increasing the basket of subsidized medicines.

The Pensioners will back him up, and Olmert will be forced to incorporate at least part of these demands in the government guidelines.

Both agendas, the political and the socio-economic, are extremely ambitious. But how realistic are they?

To set new borders unilaterally, Olmert will need international, especially American, backing. It's by no means certain that the Bush administration will see eye to eye with him on where the new lines should be drawn.

The key American document on the territorial issue is the Bush letter of April 2004. It refers to "already existing major Israeli population centres" being taken into account in setting permanent borders, but doesn't specifically mention any of the large settlement blocs Ariel, Etzion and parts of Jerusalem – that Olmert wants to keep.

Moreover, the American position is that permanent borders should be the product of negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, and it's difficult to see Washington recognizing borders that Israel sets unilaterally.

Olmert argues that with Hamas in power on the Palestinian side, Washington is likely to be more receptive to Israeli ideas on the border issue.

To implement a Peretz-style socio-economic package, Olmert will have to approve increased government spending. The trick will be to do that without impeding the impressive economic growth of the past few years – which was achieved, in large part, through fiscal austerity.

Much will depend on Olmert's diplomatic initiative on the Palestinian track. If it leads to a prolonged ceasefire, that will help Israel's growth prospects – while, possibly, postponing conflict until a future time. It also will make it easier for the government to cut the defence budget and release funds for social spending.

The bottom line: though Kadima did worse than expected, Olmert will be able to form a stable coalition and will not have to shelve any of his major policy goals. But his personal prestige has been compromised by the party's relatively poor showing, and his first order of business will be to establish his leadership credentials.

Shimon Peres, the survivor

What makes Shimon Peres run? According to Amos Oz, the Israeli writer and Peres' close friend, it is his insatiable craving for love.

Peres needs to be loved by all. When abused, as he has often been, his implied response tends to be that, even though you attack him now, if you only knew him better, you would love him.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

What has made Peres persevere despite countless personal setbacks? The firm belief that, in the choice between being a humiliated insider and a proud outsider, it is better to opt for the former. Last November, he abandoned the Labor Party, to which he had belonged since his teens and which he had led several times, after being defeated yet again for the leadership. He went to Kadima, but the post of foreign minister, for which he is eminently suited, was given to Tzipi Livni. Peres swallowed his pride and accepted a more marginal role.

Convinced of his lovability and competence, he tends to pursue his own agenda, whether or not his portfolio entitles him to it. That is why those who have worked for him like his style and respect his iron resolve, but those who have had to work with him – including prime ministers Yitzhak Rabin and Yitzchak Shamir, and many others – disliked him intensely and suspected him of undermining them, even when they agreed with him.

When the late Abba Eban was once asked why Peres did not keep his promise to him, he replied: "Because he didn't want to set a precedent."

Peres may be a brilliant statesman – the master of the whole picture – but he is a poor politician who often failed when others would have succeeded. Though a major actor on the world stage, at home he has repeatedly lost elections, despite his monumental contribution to the State of Israel in the realm of defence, foreign policy and finance.

Even when it was assumed that the Knesset would choose him as the president of Israel, in the secret ballot, his own ostensible supporters betrayed him, and he lost to the present incumbent, Moshe Katsav.

Michael Bar-Zohar, the prolific Israeli author, has just published a biography of Peres (678 pages of text and 104 pages of notes, in Hebrew; an English version is in preparation) from which the above has been gleaned. Though the book is "authorized," it's also critical. It makes fascinating reading, and tells a slice of the history of the State of Israel.

Peres was at Ben-Gurion's side before the state was proclaimed and he is still active today. At 82, he behaves, according to the title of the last chapter of the book, as if his whole life were before him.

Things you might not know about Jews out east

In past columns, I've written about the many fun and interesting things that Halifax has to offer, but in doing so, I have failed to inform my readers about some of the more historical aspects of Halifax. Reading about long and uncomfortable plane rides, cheap beer and my unsanitary living conditions, which at times includes living with mice, are all very important subjects, but you deserve more. You deserve to learn! And when you finish reading this column, you will know more about the history of the East Coast's Jewish population than anyone else you know, unless they, too, are fortunate enough to subscribe to The CJN.

Matthew Pottens in Halifax

Currently, the Jewish Student Association (JSA), the Israel Action Committee (IAC), and a number of other groups are doing wonders in uniting Jewish students in Halifax and across Atlantic Canada. Their work does not go unnoticed, and their welcoming attitude and desire to bring Jews together is terrific. The mentality of being there for one another and lending a helping hand to those in need has always been the Jewish way out here on Canada's East Coast.

During World War I, Halifax Jews were always at the harbour to offer support and hospitality to new immigrants. The community also reached out to Jewish soldiers who poured in and out of Halifax at that time.

During World War II, Canada, like the United States, was unwilling to accept new immigrants and shut its doors to Jews. Only after the war did Pier 21 in Halifax became a major port of entry for Jewish refugees. Synagogue members helped them get through immigration and offered them food, housing and plenty more. Hadassah Magazine tells of how, on the evening of Sept. 15, 1947, a group of 10 men and women stood at the pier waiting to welcome the first 20 of 1,123 Jewish children orphaned by the Holocaust who would later find homes in Canada.

In July 1999, in recognition of the significant role Pier 21 played in Canadian history, the building was, as Pier 21's official website states, "refurbished and reopened to pay tribute to those who passed through her doors and changed the face of Canada forever." The museum is dedicated to bringing to life the experiences of thousands of immigrants and refugees who disembarked in Halifax, as well as the soldiers who shipped out from and returned to Halifax.

Most of the refugees who arrived at Pier 21 boarded trains for other parts of Canada, but some stayed in the Atlantic provinces, where the Jewish population, though small in numbers, has been steadfast and successful both in maintaining Jewish traditions and contributing to mainstream life. Today, a little more than 3,000 Jews live in the Maritimes. The largest concentration is here in Halifax, which has a Jewish population of about 1,800.

The museum's structure – with its stark, tall brick walls and high-up windows that let in thin streams of light – is just as special as the building's history. The designers have converted the old warehouse on the pier into a remarkable museum, and the structure dominates the Halifax port, just as it undoubtedly dominated so many new Canadians' first impressions of this country.

Today, Jewish groups such as the aforementioned JSA and IAC are bringing Jewish students together, uniting them with members of the Jewish community and further strengthening the Jewish community of Halifax, just as the tiny local Jewish population did after both world wars.

From March 2 to March 5, the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students held its VOICES conference in Halifax. More than 50 students from seven schools across the Atlantic region came together to learn about Israel, Judaism and community-building. The VOICES conference included lectures and workshops by such well-known figures as Mira Freeman, the lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia; Alan Baker, Israel's ambassador to Canada; and Nova Scotia Liberal MP Scott Brison.

Pier 21 played a prominent role in establishing Canada's Jewish identity, yet its importance is often unrecognized due to its eastern location. And it's also not well known that the Jews of Halifax during the wars were determined to make eastern European Jews feel comfortable in a new city, just as Jewish students and groups on and around the Dalhousie University campus hope to do today.

Welcome to the Crunch

The end of term is the most dreaded time for any university student. A time of exams and assignments, the Crunch fills a three-week period when every assignment comes due and every professor realizes they haven't covered all the material they need to. This period is characterized by delirious fits of late-night study, sensitivity to daylight and a zombie-like stumble through daytime activities that turns an entire university campus into a parody of a late-night horror movie.

Gershon Richter in Winnipeg

A common side effect of this period is the degraded state of students' rooms. Though students may at the best of times not have the cleanest rooms, during the Crunch, they care so little about anything other than their schoolwork that they become completely unable to do any sort of laundry or pick up anything off the floor. What used to be a simple desk becomes a swirling mass of paper and empty soda cans, eventually gaining enough mass to achieve a detectable gravitational field.

As the mess grows, it soon swallows the entire room, completely hiding the floor. Previously undocumented forms of life develop in the new habitat between the floor and the top of the mess. Inexplicably (at least through any sort of science), a student will be able to navigate through his or her own mess and sometimes find specific pieces of paper within it, although anyone else who attempts this will be injured.

The search for specific pieces of paper among thousands is part of a long-established tradition in exam preparation. Any student who successfully uses this method for any length of time develops the ability to remember where they've put anything they may have been holding within the last three days, regardless of how much sleep they've had or how much rubble the item is buried under.

Learning to function without sleep is very important, because during the last three weeks of school, the amount of time that can be devoted to slumber falls below five hours on the best of nights. If an assignment is due or there's an exam the next day, sleep can completely disappear, leaving students to rely only on their wits in order to remain functional.

Mornings are probably the harshest reminder of the stress of this strenuous time. You wake up feeling completely tired and realize just how overworked you are. The night has disappeared without anything to show for it, and the morning brings with it more work to do. It's at these desperate times that we turn to the chemical reinforcement of coffee.

According to many health professionals and experts, coffee is what happens when sleep is liquefied and made potable. The active ingredient, caffeine, is not only addictive, but also one of the staples of a good student's diet. During a normal schedule, students are expected to drink several cups a day. During these final weeks, coffee consumption goes through the roof. In a perfect world, all universities would have their own coffee factories, connected by pipelines to all the other structures on campus. And all sinks would have three taps: cold, hot and coffee. That way, a student would finally be able to simply fill a cup full at any time, since we live as much on coffee as we do on water, particularly at this time of year.

So as I sit here, sipping my fourth cup of coffee since lunch, having had six hours of sleep in the last two days and having spent the great majority of the rest of the time hard at work or in class, I wonder about the necessity of the Crunch.

Is this the true test of university life? Is this a trial by fire to make sure that we can handle the stress of a "real-life" job, or is it just a vicious accident that happens year after year, regardless of how many cups of coffee we drink or how clean we keep our rooms?

The only ones who can answer that are the professors.

The Kirshner File

Unilateralism is the name of Olmert's game

As the ailing Israeli prime minister, Ariel Sharon, lay comatose in a hospital, having been stricken by a massive stroke on Jan. 4 that abruptly ended his career, his hand-picked successor, Ehud Olmert, won a mandate in last week's election, however lukewarm, to govern the country. Although Olmert's centrist Kadima party fell far short of winning a sufficient number of Knesset seats to form a stable coalition government painlessly, Olmert was nevertheless poised to become Israel's 12th prime minister and carry out his ambitious plan to withdraw from wide swaths of the West Bank, delineate Israel's final border and preserve its identity as a Jewish state with a clear Jewish majority.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Contrary to forecasts, Kadima – formed by Sharon four months ago as a breakaway faction of the Likud party, which fared badly in the election and probably placed Benjamin Netanyahu's leadership in jeopardy – won 29 seats rather than the expected 35 to 40.

To cobble together a government capable of achieving his most important objective, functional separation from the Palestinians, Olmert will have to rely, first and foremost, on the support of the Labor party, which picked up 19 seats, and on parties such as Shas, Meretz and the newly created Pensioners party. Negotiations may last several weeks.

This was Israel's fifth election in a decade, and like the elections in1996, 1999, 2001 and 2003, it was basically about the ultimate status of the territories captured by Israel in the 1967 Six Day War, an iconic event that has irretrievably shaped Israeli politics.

Burning issues from poverty to social justice surfaced, too, but the March 28 election was really about the future of the West Bank, which is where some 240,000 Jews live in 121 fortified settlements. The election, therefore, was essentially a referendum turning on Olmert's strategy of unilateralism. As he put it in the immediate aftermath of the election, "We are ready to make compromises, to give up parts of the beloved land of Israel… and evacuate Jews who live there… If the Palestinians react… we will return to the negotiating table. If they don't do so, Israel will take its fate into its own hands."

In practice, unilateralism – a policy devised by Sharon and his advisers in close consultation with Olmert – means that Israel will bypass the Palestinian Authority and take bold steps to assure its security and viability as a Jewish state. Unilateralism, the first tangible expression of which was Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip last summer, is underpinned by the assumption that Israel has no reliable, trustworthy Palestinian partner capable or willing to combat terrorism and honour solemn agreements.

Not surprisingly, the Palestinians are none too pleased by unilateralism, which trumps the now-dormant 2003 "road map" peace plan. On the eve of the election, Mahmoud Abbas, the PA president, described unilateralism as "very dangerous," while Ismail Haniyeh, a Hamas leader and the new PA prime minister, declared that the Palestinians would never accept borders defined by Israel.

Sharon, the godfather of the settlements in Gaza and the West Bank, launched unilateralism by boycotting Yasser Arafat, the late PA president, and isolating him in his compound in Ramallah. Under Sharon's watch, Israel broke off peace negotiations with the PA and concentrated on trying to crush the second Palestinian uprising, which erupted in September 2000.

Following a sharp upsurge of Palestinian terrorism in 2002, a period during which the intifadah was at its height in terms of Israeli casualties, Sharon took unilateralism to the next level with his momentous decision to build a barrier along and through the West Bank so as to keep out suicide bombers.

Modelled after the fence that encloses Gaza, and consisting largely of electrified fences, ditches, concrete walls and guard posts, the barrier has been a success militarily, with suicide bombings having dropped sharply in the past four years.

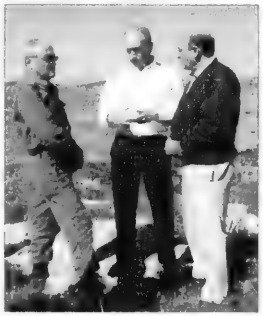
The barrier, which has gobbled up about eight per cent of the West Bank, has nonetheless been problematic. The International Court of Justice in the Hague has denounced it as illegal, while the United Nations has branded it as a breach of law. More importantly, the barrier has caused untold inconvenience and distress to the Palestinians and sowed further bitterness and resentment in their ranks.

The preservation of the settlement blocs in the West Bank, from Maaleh Adumim to Gush Etzion, constitutes the third pillar of unilateralism. The settlements in these blocs, which are near or relatively near Jerusalem, contain most of the Jewish settlers.

Olmert, the prime minister-in-waiting, is more or less faithful to Sharon's template. As he said in an interview published in the newspaper Yediot Achronot on the day of the election, "We must preserve the settlement blocs" and "fix the route of the… barrier beyond which we will not longer remain."

Despite these weighty pronouncements, Olmert, a former Likud hardliner who has segued into something of a pragmatist, has diverged, theoretically at least, from Sharon's mantra of refusal to enter into final status talks with the PA and his preference for long-term interim accords with the Palestinians.

On Jan. 17, in his first policy statement, Olmert expressed a willingness to reach a permanent status agreement with Abbas, who claimed recently that the Arab-Israeli conflict can be resolved within a year. During his premiership, Sharon met twice with Abbas, but the pair never discussed fundamental issues such as borders or settlements.



Ehud Olmert, centre, with Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, right, and Chief of Staff Gen. Dan Halutz

Olmert, though having jettisoned Sharon's dogma, has said that he will not resume talks with the PA unless Abbas disarms Palestinian militias. "The key to advancing the political process is the Palestinians ending terrorism," he said. "We're tired of declarations and empty promises." But as much as Abbas wants a resumption of negotiations, he has flatly refused to take up Olmert's challenge of confronting militants.

Though Olmert may be sincere in his desire to tackle final-status issues in co-ordination with Abbas, his foreign minister and deputy minister, Tzipi Livni, has clouded matters by having labelled Abbas as "irrelevant."

Whether Olmert eventually enters into serious talks with Abbas at some point in the months ahead is completely unclear at this juncture because of the Hamas factor.

Hamas, which defeated Fatah in the PA's Jan. 25 legislative election and whose cabinet was ratified by that body as Israelis went to the polls on March 28, refuses to recognize Israel, renounce terrorism or abide by commitments signed by the PA since the 1993 Oslo peace process. But in what was apparently a conciliatory message to Israelis, Haniyeh said, "We don't want a whirlpool of blood in this region."

In all likelihood, Olmert will dismiss Haniyeh's statement as mere rhetoric and reiterate that Israel will not negotiate with the PA as long as it is dominated by Hamas, an Islamic fundamentalist organization whose charter starkly calls for Israel's destruction.

In light of Hamas' dominant position in the PA and its resistance to accepting Israel's existence and legitimacy, Olmert may choose to forego negotiations with Abbas and move forward with unilateralism within a year.

Unlike Sharon, who invariably kept his cards exceedingly close to his vest, Olmert has made no secret of his intentions. In a flurry of statements last month designed to flesh out his views, Olmert focused on a wide range of key issues.

He talked about drawing Israel's final borders by 2010 on the basis of the boundary formed by the barrier; pledged to designate the settlement of Ariel, 17 kilometres inside the West Bank, as Israeli territory; indicated that the Gush Etzion and Maaleh Adumim blocs would be an "inseparable part of Israel"; hinted that Maaleh Adumim, the largest West Bank settlement, would be physically linked to Jerusalem; promised that the Jordan Valley will be retained by Israel as a buffer zone; and voiced support for the establishment of "a modern, democratic Palestinian state." In this connection, Olmert said that Palestinian refugees can be absorbed only by a sovereign Palestinian state.

If Olmert carries out his plans, he will have no alternative but to give up the bulk of the settlements and thereby displace an estimated 80,000 Jews, a tall order by any criteria. Judging by his actions so far, he seems determined to stamp his imprimatur on Israel. He evacuated Amona, an unauthorized West Bank outpost, and presented a plan to his defence minister, Shaul Mofaz, to dismantle all illegal outposts. In defiance of settlers in Hebron, he declared the city a closed military area. He also ordered construction of the barrier to be accelerated so that it can be finished by the end of this year.

Should he succeed in implementing his vision of a smaller but more secure Israel, Olmert will leave a deep imprint on history.

Israeli public opinion remains hawkish, says Yossi Olmert

Panel of experts analyze election results at BJCC

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

As the results of the Israeli election came in on March 28, a panel of experts gathered in Toronto to discuss the outcome.

The panel discussion, sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Consulate General of Israel, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and Shalom Toronto, featured Yossi Olmert, an authority on Israeli politics, and the brother of Israel's acting prime minister, Ehud Olmert; Cobie Brosh, Israel's consul-general; David Goldberg, director of research & education, Canada-Israel Committee, and Gil Tamary, an Israeli television journalist. It was moderated by Yonatan Dahoach HaLevy, managing editor of the Hebrew-language newspaper, Shalom Toronto.

Brosh began by saying that it will be difficult for Kadima to establish a strong and stable coalition. He also noted that parties like the Pensioners' Party, which ran on one issue, will likely raise their voice on political issues as well. According to Brosh, the success of parties like the Pensioners' reflects the fact that Israelis are fed up with politicians. "First of all, fewer people vote. Second, most people vote out of protest," said Brosh.

Golberg was impressed by the extent to which non-security issues rose to the fore in this election. "It may seem perverse that with Hamas in the territories and Iran breathing down their necks, that a party representing pensioners would get so many seats," he said. "This demonstrates an attempt to become normal."

Olmert believes that even though many voters chose Kadima over Likud, Israeli public opinion remains hawkish. "It doesn't mean it'll be easier for the prime minister to withdraw from the territories," he said. Working against Kadima, according to Olmert, was the fact that security was not an issue for many voters. "Everybody took for granted" that that any one of Kadima, Likud or Labor would act against terrorism. Olmert said that the low voter turnout seen in this election will continue. "People will vote less and less because that's what happens in prosperous Western nations."

An expert panel consisting of (L-R): Cobie Brosh, David Goldberg, Professor Yossi Olmert, Gil Tamary, and Yonatan Dahoach HaLevy analyzed the results of last month's Israeli election at the BJCC

According to Tamari, the Israeli political map has changed with this election. "One thing is for sure in this election: we have many winners, but only one clear loser: Binyamin Netanyahu." He also noted that Amir Peretz, who led Labor to win 20 seats without party stalwart Shimon Peres, had an even greater victory: he put a social agenda on the table in the election.

Hillel working with Muslim leaders at U of T

Hillel @ U of T's efforts to promote interfaith dialogue and campus harmony are being lauded at the highest level

On March 23, University of Toronto President David Naylor praised Hillel's efforts at working with leaders in the Muslim community to foster stronger relationships on campus.

"I am proud of the way that Muslim students on campus have joined forces with other groups, most notably Hillel, to challenge ethno-cultural stereotyping and actions that promote intolerance," said Naylor. "In many ways, these two communities have provided a model of bridge building for all of us to pursue further."

The remarks came during a speech to the Governing Council Secretariat addressing recent attacks on the Muslim community on the University of Toronto campus.

That same day, the Muslim Students' Association at the University of Toronto mentioned its joint programming with Hillel in a press release reaffirming the safety of U of T for Muslim students. The MSA release touched on recent incidents on campus, saying that their characterization as indicative of an Islamophobic trend is irresponsible

Over the past several months, Hillel has been working with U of T's Anti-Racism and Cultural Diversity office and other student groups such as the Muslim Students' association on joint programming as a means of engagement through active dialogue and discourse. "We tried to create an atmosphere where students could come explore their spirituality, learn and express their own feelings towards this issue," says Hagai Kuperman, Student President of Hillel @ U of T. "This really speaks to Hillel's message of being diverse and doing creative programming."

"These kind of activities offer a safe space for our student groups to learn from each other," said Nouman Ashraf, anti-racism and cultural diversity officer at the University of Toronto.

"Each interfaith program has brought four times as many students as the other programming on campus," says Melyssa Lantsman, one of Hillel's student coordinators. "By focusing on what we have in common, our student groups are going beyond labels to try to attain deeper understanding of one another."

Beit Rayim to call Lebovic Jewish Campus home

Big changes are afoot for Beit Rayim.

The 230-family congregation – currently located on Bayview Avenue north of Highway 7 - is building a new home on the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus. The building, which will be shared with United Synagogue Day School, is scheduled for completion in September 2008.

The new synagogue building will be the realization of a long-held dream. "We have been pursuing a permanent facility in the Bathurst Street corridor for a long time," says Karen Baron, immediate past president of the synagogue. "We were always looking to fill the gap in Conservative Judaism in the northern Bathurst corridor."

The move is coming at a time of change for the synagogue, which is mourning the sudden death of Rabbi Sol Tanenzapf. "It's been a blow, but we'll keep going," says Baron.

Members of Beit Rayim enjoy Purim.

Beit Rayim, a Conservative egalitarian synagogue, currently rents space from USDS, so the two organizations already have a strong relationship. Baron anticipates that their partnership in the new building will benefit both organizations. Classrooms, for example, will be used by USDS during the day, and by Beit Rayim's large supplementary Hebrew school in the evenings twice a week.

Since most of Beit Rayim's members live in Richmond Hill or Thornhill, the location of the Lebovic campus is ideal. The $150 million campus, which is being built by UJA Federation through its Tomorrow Campaign, will be situated on 50 acres of land on Bathurst, north of Rutherford.

While existing members will be the first to benefit, Baron also believes that the synagogue will grow with the surrounding community. "As Thornhill Woods grows, there's going to be a large group that will be interested in a Conservative synagogue," she says.

Baron hopes that increased membership will allow the synagogue to expand their adult education program, hold daily minyans, and enlarge their supplementary school, which already boasts more than 200 students. As the synagogue grows, "we will be able to offer more services, more programs because of our growth," says Baron. "But we won't change our philosophy. We pride ourselves on the fact that we are egalitarian. We have a lot of participation on our bimah."

Words & Deeds Leadership Award Dinner honours RBC's Gordon Nixon

UJA Federation / CIJA partnership on display at MTCC

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

The strong relationship between UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and The Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) was on display March 29 in front of close to 1,100 guests, including a number of high profile dignitaries.

The inaugural Words & Deeds Leadership Award Dinner, co-sponsored by UJA Federation and CIJA, honoured Gordon M. Nixon, the president & CEO of RBC Financial Group, for his contributions to humanitarian causes and to tolerance and inclusion.

CIJA, chaired by Brent Belzberg and Steven Cummings, is funded by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other Canadian Federations through UIA Federations Canada.

The event, held at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre (MTCC), was headed by honourary chairs Gerald Schwartz and Lawrence Tanenbaum and was co-chaired by Belzberg, Richard Venn and Charles Winograd. Ed Sonshine emceed the evening's festivities.

"It is a particular honour to receive recognition from the Jewish community – one that gives so much of themselves, not only for Canada and Israel, but to the broader community," Nixon told the crowd, which included notables such as Toronto mayor David Miller, Ontario's attorney-general Michael Bryant, Ontario's minister of education, Gerrard Kennedy, Ontario minister of community safety and correctional services, Monte Kwinter, and Israeli ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker.

"We thank you Gord, for guiding one of the country's great financial institutions with integrity and insight," said David Engel, chair of the UJA Federation Board. "And we thank you for your dedication to volunteer efforts that make your family's community and all our communities, better places to live."

"When I chaired the United Way Campaign of Greater Toronto, one of my rallying cries to our cabinet was the per capita giving of UJA Federation," said Nixon. "And many UJA supporters are also leaders in the United Way Campaign. This is a generous community that should take pride in its philanthropy – in fact, if you did a tour of our city's culture, medical and educational infrastructure, you would not believe that one per cent of Canada's population was Jewish," he said to an enthusiastic round of applause.

Nixon conveyed a sense of dismay when he spoke of ongoing cases of anti-Semitism in Canada; a Canada known for its multicultural mosaic.

"I am saddened that Canada, a country that prides itself on being a tolerant, inclusive, multicultural society, needs a CIJA or a UJA Federation to advocate for our creative and generous Jewish community and for Israel," he said. "They exist, in part, because anti-Semitism is still a reality in spite of our laws that prohibit racism. Canadian Jews are still victims of hate crimes. Friends in the Jewish community, much to my ignorance and disbelief, tell me of the subtle bias they still feel in Canada's business community and even the fear they have for their children and grandchildren, of a broad resurgence in anti-Semitism."

Nixon ended his address with an account of a trip he took to Israel with Toronto Jewish leaders almost two years ago; a trip that clearly had an affect on his words this particular evening.

"What a beautiful country and what a great experience," he said. "I marveled at how a country could have accomplished so much in such a short time under such difficult circumstances. It was a special trip and I look forward to visiting again."

PEJE conference inspires Toronto educators

Twenty-four Toronto educators and community leaders recently returned from an educational conference armed with new ideas and the inspiration to improve Jewish day school education in the city.

The 2006 Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE) Assembly for Jewish Day School Education, which took place from March 19-21 in Boston, attracted more than 1,000 day-school professionals, lay leaders, major donors, and community leaders from across the denominational spectrum.

The Torontonians—hailing from Bialik Hebrew Day School, Toronto Heschel School, Leo Baeck Day School, Associated Hebrew Schools, B'nai Akiva (Ulpanat Orot and Yeshivat Or Chaim), and Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School—joined representatives from 225 day schools in the United States, Canada, Mexico, the United Kingdom, Australia and Israel.

"The scope of the conference, the wide variety of programs, the quality of the speakers was impressive," says Michael Davis, chair of the Board of Jewish Education's marketing committee.

PEJE was founded in 1997 by Michael Steinhardt and Rabbi Yitz Greenberg to create a vibrant and sustainable Jewish future through strengthening the Jewish day school movement in North America. PEJE makes grants, provides expertise, and advocates for the day school movement.

Two dozen Toronto educators recently took part in the PEJE conference in Boston

Shana Harris, Principal of General Studies at Bialik Hebrew Day School, who will be taking over as the school's director of education in August, was moved by how similar the challenges facing day school are, even for schools separated by distance or ideology. "There are a number of common stories," she says. "Filling Jewish day schools with Jewish children, fundraising, the challenge of providing excellence while still making education affordable, board development—I think many schools face the same challenges."

Both Davis and Harris say that meeting with their peers from other communities was a highlight. "The conference is an opportunity to really learn about the cutting-edge best practice models that are occurring across North America in areas of governance, fundraising, and marketing related to day schools," says Harris.

The real value of the conference, however, may be in its ability to inspire. "There's a real passion for how important Jewish education is to the survival of the Jewish people," says Davis. "It's motivating. It truly invigorates the professionals and the lay leaders."

Toasting the future of education

Warren and Debbie Kimel recently celebrated the beginning of construction on CHAT'S Kimel Family Education Centre at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan. Replacing CHAT'S current temporary Richmond Hill facility, the new Kimel Family Education Centre will provide an exceptional state of the art Jewish educational environment for up to 1200 students. On hand to toast the Kimels were Joe Lebovic (left) and David Engel, Chair UJA Federation Board (right). The Centre will be ready to open for the school year beginning September 2007.

Ambassador fields questions on French anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

If the questions asked of the French ambassador to Canada at a speaking engagement last week are any indication, Daniel Jouanneau still has some work to do to convince skeptics that France has a handle on its problem of anti-Semitism.

Jouanneau delivered a mostly positive message about French efforts against anti-Semitism, when he spoke at a lunchtime meeting of the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation of Canada, held at the law offices of Heenan Blaikie.

However, many of the ambassador's assertions were challenged during a question and answer session that followed his address.

One challenger questioned whether the situation had improved to the extent that the ambassador had indicated, another suggested traditional anti-Semitism had been blended with modern anti-Israel views. One reminded him that the former ambassador to England had called Israel "a shitty little country" at a private dinner party, another suggested France, going back to the Six Day War in 1967, had repeatedly "vilified" Israel in international forums, and another challenged his assertion it was "social" issues that led to the rise in anti-Semitism.

In his opening remarks, Jouanneau acknowledged that French policy-makers were slow to accept that the country's Jews were experiencing a resurgence of anti-Semitism, but he said the government is taking the matter seriously and has developed "proactive" responses to the problem.

France has stiffened penalties on convictions, trained police to recognize the phenomenon, stepped up video surveillance of Jewish institutions and banned broadcasts of Hezbollah's satellite television service. In addition, Prime Minister Dominique de Villepin chairs a cabinet-level committee that studies incidents of anti-Semitism and analyses their causes.

The result of the country's tough new measures has been a 47 per cent decrease in incidents in 2005 from 2004, Jouanneau stated.

Jouanneau acknowledged that five or six years ago, the French government thought "anti-Semitism was not a real threat." The country's leadership believed manifestations of anti-Semitism, such as the Dreyfus affair in which Alfred Dreyfus, a Jewish French military officer, was wrongly found guilty of treason in 1894, and the pro-Nazi Vichy government of World War II, were in the past and that anti-Semitism had more or less dissipated in France.

However, attacks on Jewish cemeteries and synagogues were among the incidents that caught the eye of senior French officials. "President [Jacques] Chirac decided to address the issue," and France adopted a "very proactive policy. We see anti-Semitism as a scourge that needs a specific answer," Jouanneau stated.

"Our policy is very simple," he continued. "Zero tolerance. All anti-Semitic acts are unacceptable to us… Any aggression against Jews is an [attack] on the republican values of the country."

The ambassador suggested there are several reasons behind recent French anti-Semitism, but the "basic roots of anti-Semitism are social" – unemployment, a loss of reference points, an identity crisis.

Referring to the five-million strong Muslim community in France, Jouanneau said there's no direct link between them and anti-Semitism.

"Anti-Semitism is not fuelled by Islam in France," he asserted.

The first person to pose a question cited a recent New York Times article that reported thousands of French Jews have immigrated to Israel because they feel unsafe to appear openly Jewish in France and that officials in schools feel the government has done little to address issues of anti-Semitism.

Jouanneau acknowledged that incidents of anti-Semitism do occur, but "on the other hand, we have good examples of good neighbourhoods between Jews and non-Jews." He said that "the article is probably true, [but] probably it is a part of the reality and it is not fair to generalize about the whole country."

Asked whether France's UN voting record and its siding with Palestinians against Israel contributed to a climate that promotes attacks on Jews, Jouanneau said the majority of France's Muslims are "moderate and well-integrated." He said moderate Muslims condemned the recent kidnapping, torture and murder of French Jew Ilan Halimi.

He also noted that France's position on Hamas is that it is a terrorist organization, and France will not open normal relations with a Hamas government unless it recognizes Israel, forgoes terrorism and agrees to the "road map" peace plan.

Responding to another questioner who suggested France has vilified Israel for more than 30 years, Jouanneau said, "There is absolutely no vilification of Israel in France. Not at all."

He said France takes a balanced approach to the Mideast conflict, and while "we think there should be a Palestinian state, Israel's security is essential for us."

Questioned on how France could consider itself balanced if it repeatedly voted against Israel at the United Nations, Jouanneau said France does not have a concerted anti-Israel policy at the UN.

"It may happen we disagree with Israel on certain issues," he said. France has joined a majority of UN members in voting against Israel. "We support resolutions we think are right… It's not a deliberate policy against Israel."

The Jewish Chronicle goes online

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Since this year marks the 350th anniversary of the return of the Jews to England, it seems a propitious time to mention that England's Jewish Chronicle newspaper came online last month, allowing researchers to search all back issues by word or phrase, over any range of years from 1841 to the present.

Based in London, the Chronicle is the oldest Anglo-Jewish paper in the world that is still publishing. This grande dame of Jewish newspapers has been reporting on cultural, social and historical events in the Jewish world week after week for 165 years. Now, all of its myriad birth, marriage, death and social notices are at the fingertips of genealogical researchers willing to invest in a website password. (Unless you have a subscription, however, access isn't cheap: it starts at about $55 and page downloads are extra.)

Historians and scholars will also be attracted by the paper's sweeping variety of news reports, cultural reviews, editorials, essays and articles – hundreds of which pertain to the Jews of Canada. Here, for example, is the start of the Chronicle's very astute review of Son of a Smaller Hero, the first novel by Mordecai Richler that was worthy of serious critical attention.

"This book is fascinating reading for British Jews, if only for its apparent exposure of Jewish working-class life and values in the Canadian city of Montreal," a critic wrote in 1955. "This naked portrayal of a community shackled by a ritual without a theology is committed ruthlessly to paper in the form of a novel by the young, gifted, Canadian writer, Mordecai Richler.

"If Mr. Richler is to be believed, the Jews he writes of live in a claustrophobic ghetto of superstition, prejudice, and vulgarity, ignorant of their own great, traditional Jewish values. They are presented without charm or kindness and appear to live in loud tenements of incestuous hate. I have a feeling that the picture is distorted, verging on caricature. But caricature, spiteful and repulsive as it may be, can be compelling. Mr. Richler has the ability to make it so."

In the old days, when back issues were available only on microfilm, this review might have taken an hour to find, but the Chronicle's search engine found it in less than a second. For anyone doing Anglo-Jewish research, be it genealogical, historical, or literary in nature, the JC Archives are a modern marvel. For a free demonstration, visit the website www.thejc.com and click on "JC Archives" and then "Trial Search."

It's becoming almost passé to report on the astonishing technological strides that genealogy has made as a result of the Internet. Readers of this column already know that I consider the Toronto Star's "Pages of the Past" a superlative resource for Jewish genealogists in Toronto: the service has led me to literally hundreds of items pertaining to my large family tree from roughly 1915 to 2002.

We can't quit this topic without trumpeting the fact that many other newspapers have also made their historic content available electronically in recent years. Mainstream titles include the New York Times, Wall Street Journal, Washington Post, Boston Globe, Chicago Tribune, Los Angeles Times and the Globe and Mail. Once akin to seeking a needle in a haystack, the search for "BMDs" (birth, marriage and death notices) has never been easier.

This month marks the 10th anniversary of this column, and by happy coincidence, the Ontario Genealogical Society has just published a 232-page collection of the best columns that have appeared in this space. "Roots and Remembrance: Explorations in Jewish Genealogy" is available for $27 from the OGS via its website, www.ogs.on.ca or by phoning 416-489-0734.

A healthy, happy and spiritually rewarding Passover to all.

The real chillul HaShem

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

In recent months, two news items about Islam have surprised – some would even say shocked – the world. First was the reaction of Muslims to editorial cartoons depicting their prophet Muhammad that were originally published last year in a Danish newspaper. The cartoons resulted in boycotts, as well as massive and often violent demonstrations. Then there was the story of the hapless fellow in Afghanistan who converted to Christianity in the 1990s, but was arrested recently after showing up at a police station and announcing his conversion. Only after the entire western world expressed its utter revolt was he spared a death sentence.

Both these events illustrate the wide chasm that exists between two opposing points of view. What are from one point of view a matter of freedom of expression (as in the case of the cartoons) and a matter of personal freedom in one's choice of faith are from the other point of view unforgivable insults to God and religion.

Both events also illustrate what can happen when a legal system that is more than 1,000 years old, sharia law, is applied today.

At first, this realization caused me some concern. After all, we, too, as Jews have Torah law, a Divine system that we hope will one day be the basis for legal proceedings. How would Torah law respond to these two infractions? Would our Torah's reaction be so far out in left field, and would it also be so contrary to today's western concepts of freedom?

Certainly, Judaism shows great concern for the glory of God. We call this kiddush HaShem. The opposite of kiddush HaShem is chillul HaShem, the lowering and dishonouring of the esteem of God. This is precisely what the Islamic world claimed that the depiction of the prophet Muhammad with a missile wrapped, turban-like, around his head was a chillul HaShem. In the case of the Christian convert, apparently the chillul HaShem was even more severe, for not only did the individual dishonour his God, he preferred another god as superior.

Judaism also teaches that chillul HaShem must be avoided at all costs, even at the pain of death. However, while Jews have willingly died for kiddush HaShem, Jews don't kill others over chillul HaShem. Throughout history, there have certainly been Jews who have left their faith, who have become meshumad. In opting out of Judaism, their community would have relegated them to the lowest status, if not outright excommunicated them. But there is no death penalty for a meshumad. (Interestingly, if the same meshumad should compel and coerce others to leave their faith, he would then merit the death penalty.)

Similarly, there is no sanction, and certainly no death penalty, for one outside the faith who is perceived to have made a chillul HaShem. I say perceived, because the Danish cartoonists had no intent to affront Islam and in fact did not insult Islam. Rather, they were bemoaning the militant Islamic fundamentalists who falsely claim to act in the name of Islam.

I respectfully suggest to the world of Islam that the true chillul HaShem that Muslims should be concerned with has nothing to do with one person's defection from the faith or some European cartoons. The chillul HaShem they ought to be worried about is the bombing of school children, wedding parties and people in office towers, as well as the slitting of a journalist's throat for the camera and strapping oneself with explosives in order to murder civilians. May I suggest that this is where the real chillul HaShem lies?

The eternal system we call Judaism which, I might add, is much older than Islam – would fare quite well under the scrutiny of contemporary western values.

Maimonides – for the general reader

Maimonides* by Sherwin B. Nuland, Oxford University Press.

Moses Maimonides, the Rambam (1135-1204), was the quintessential Jewish genius – a Renaissance man before there was a Renaissance. His horizons were vast: he was a masterful physician who served a sultan, as well as a dazzling scholar who wrote some of the enduring masterpieces of rabbinic literature. He is also renowned for his series of texts on logic, astronomy and medicine.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The leader of Egyptian Jewry, he was often consulted by Jews around the world on a variety of theological and ethical issues. Always an enemy of strife, he was unafraid to take unpopular communal and intellectual stances. Many of his opinions led to widespread debate and are still subject to differences of opinion. He was a Jewish leader in a Muslim world, a rationalist living in a time of superstition. Above all else, he was an icon to his people because of his unremitting dedication to their well-being and continuity.

Sherwin Nuland, a clinical professor of medicine at Yale and a well-known teacher of bioethics and medical history, is the author of several previous books including the acclaimed How We Die.

In the prologue to this brief biography he writes: "To understand this little volume of mine, no previous knowledge of Moses ben Maimon or of his era is required, nor of philosophy, medicine, Judaica or academic methods. It is accordingly without references that might distract the general reader; it is completely the product of the understanding to which I have come after a long voyage of study; in emphasis and interpretation, I offer my book as this Jewish doctor's study of the most extraordinary of Jewish doctors."

The author asserts that Maimonides wrote The Guide for the Perplexed in a complex and philosophical manner that assured its obscurity to all but a few of his readers. Why? Nuland speculates that he was deliberately preaching to a select congregation, promulgating notions that were still new and hard to accept. Better to write in ways that only the select few could interpret than to be exposed to the abuse of the many. A more straightforward style would only have been counterproductive.

In his Commentary on the Mishnah, Maimonides first articulated the theme that would frequently recur throughout his writings, namely that the words of Torah and Talmud are not always to be taken literally. Much of the holy writings, he said, are in the form of metaphor, with the deeper meaning only to be understood by those with the proper training and intellect.

About the idea of the Messiah, Maimonides wrote that despite popular opinion he will be like a mortal man, even if far wiser. He will restore the House of David and lead Jews toward the political independence of Palestine. Other than that, the world will remain substantially the same after the Messiah's coming, minus its hardships. The necessities of life will be more easily available in order to free men to study. In time, the Messiah will die to be succeeded by descendants who will maintain the heritage and continue the Davidic line. Surprisingly, for him the coming of the Messiah had no supernatural implications.

When he was 30, Maimonides daringly proclaimed his Thirteen Principles of the Jewish faith. Among them was this: "I believe with perfect faith that there will be a resurrection of the dead at the time when it shall please the Creator." This principle would seem to be at odds with his contention, indicated in some of his other writings, that the resurrection should not be thought of in terms of the physical body. The issue of what is in fact resurrected is somewhat ambiguous – very likely on purpose.

This is a well written, accessible and stimulating study of the life and ideas of one of Judaism's most brilliant and esteemed personalities.

Free online Haggadot, Pt. 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Passover is quickly approaching and that means pretty soon you'll be reaching into a familiar drawer and pulling out a stack of well-worn Haggadot. Nothing will ever replace those Haggadot and their special memories. But if you take a few minutes on the Internet, you will find many stimulating and provocative online Haggadot that could give you new insights and make you shine at this year's seders.

Most of the Haggadot below are in English, some with Hebrew sections. Please be aware that many of these Haggadot contain God's name and should be treated accordingly.

Chabad has created a wonderful section about the Haggadah. You can go through the seder with an English translation that includes step-by-step instructions. And you can download a pdf file that contains the entire Hebrew text of the Haggadah. [http://tinyurl.com/gq9ab]

For insights into how the seder has been observed in Sephardi homes, take a look at the Sephardi Connection site. For example, among North African Sephardim, after Mah Nishtanah is recited, the seder leader would leave the room and come back with a walking stick and the afikoman in a cloth on his shoulder. The children would ask: "Where are you coming from?" And he would proceed to tell the story of his exodus from Egypt. On the other hand, the Haggadah adds, "Note: stealing the afikoman is an Ashkenazi tradition." When the Sephardi seder concludes, "some take the charoset and put it in five places at the entrance of the house for good luck." [http://tinyurl.com/osuoq]

Several traditional Haggadot have been scanned in their entirety and can be downloaded and printed out at the Torah on the Net site. I particularly recommend the 1920 edition that is "arranged by J.D. Eisenstein" and "illustrated by LOLA." [http://tinyurl.com/q96rx]

There are many online Haggadot that represent a great deal of individual effort. Robert Parnes' Haggadah, a synthesis of the traditional and the modern, is set out clearly with responsive readings. [http://tinyurl.com/g8qbb]

Another unique version is The Anonymous Haggadah: A Synthesis of The Passover Ritual and Liturgy With The Twelve Steps of Recovery By Hershy Worch. Worch draws a parallel between the Israelites' trek to freedom and the modern-day recovery program used by people to free themselves from various addictions and dependencies. [http://jewish.com/modules.php?name=Passover_JACS]

Charles Finn took a decade to put together his companion to the Haggadah. Just 16 pages long, in Word format, it is mostly in English with some Hebrew text. He has illustrated his work with lovely medieval woodcuts and more contemporary artwork. [http://tinyurl.com/zmc8s]

A bit less traditional but a very wonderful site is Uncle Eli's Special-for-Kids Most Fun Ever Under-the-Table Passover Haggadah. Written in the style of Dr. Seuss, Uncle Eli retells the Haggadah in a familiar yet unique way. [http://tinyurl.com/zxd9x]

After visiting everyone else's Haggadah, create your own. The Open Source Haggadah allows you to skim through Hebrew and English text, commentary, songs, readings and rituals, choose the elements that appeal to you, and assemble your own Haggadah online. You can even filter texts by affiliation: "Chabad, Conservative, feminist, humorous, etc." When you're done, you can print your own Haggadah. And if you have a favourite custom or commentary you'd like to share, you are encouraged to add it to the site. Please note that this site is free but does require registration. Also, I have had some problems with the display of Hebrew characters on my PC. On my Mac, Hebrew displayed properly. [www.opensourcehaggadah.com/]

If you're planning to lead a seder this year and need a bit of help on your Hebrew pronunciation or want to brush up on a tune, the Virtual Cantor is at your service. The Cantor – also known as Josh Sharfman – has recorded the entire traditional Haggadah and put it online so that you can listen to it anytime. The seder has been divided into 38 parts, so that you can easily jump to any part of the Haggadah. And since all the files are in the mp3 format, you can even copy them onto your iPod or mp3 player. [www.virtualcantor.com/haggadah.htm]

CHAT students win law and business awards

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Despite a double curriculum of Jewish and general studies and – for some – the drive to do well in their last year before university, a group of students at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto have spent many after-school hours this year preparing for major competitions in law and business.

Their work paid off.

Jordan Hoffman, who teaches economics and business studies at CHAT's Tanenbaum campus in Downsview, says the school (both his branch and the Richmond Hill branch) "swept the awards" in this year's provincial competition run by DECA International, an association of high school and college students studying business, marketing and related courses.

CHAT, a first-time competitor, won a combined total of 35 awards.

For three months, Hoffman met with students weekly for at least two hours at a time to train for the contest, studying cases and marketing.

He is still working with six students from his campus who will travel to Dallas at the end of April to take part in the finals. Five students from Richmond Hill, who prepared for DECA with the help of teacher Ray Buchowski, will also take part in the finals. CHAT Richmond Hill's DECA team was named best new chapter.

At the Richmond Hill branch, a team of 10 of Lynne Howard's Grade 12 law students took part in the Ontario Bar Association's (OBA) Secondary School Mock Trial Tournament, as well as the York Region Judges' Cup Mock Trial Tournament, which is co-ordinated by the Newmarket courts.

The team stood in second place at the OBA event, and Grade 12 student Philip Pollack won the crown attorney award at the York Region competition.

Aaron Posluns, left, and Robbie Handelman are delighted to receive their DECA award for being among the top five pairs of students in the Hospitality Management category. [Jordan Hoffman photo]

In both law competitions, students take part in a simulated trial, using the same fictitious criminal case.

The competition is "a great opportunity for students to test the waters and see if this is a career they'd be interested in," said Howard, whose students met two to three times a week and were coached by criminal defence lawyer Sholem Altman. Among other things, it fosters teamwork, as well as leadership and communication skills, she added.

Howard said she was so proud of her students' high-level performances that she was actually moved to tears by the judge's comments. "They'll be master lawyers and judges. They can come help my other mock trial teams," she said.

"Since I was a kid I always wanted to be a lawyer," said Pollack, who also won an award at the DECA event. He "jumped at the opportunity" to take part in the OBA competition, he said.

Being in an actual courtroom for the first time and making a presentation in front of a real judge at the York Region competition was "almost like a dream" and "so much fun," he said.

For DECA, Pollack was director of operations for his school's chapter. In addition, he directed this year's school play.

Like Pollack, Melissa Grossman of CHAT's Tanenbaum campus knows what she wants to do career-wise. "I have a 10-year plan," she said. "I want to go into the music industry."

The Grade 12 DECA finalist has found her participation in DECA to be "extremely rewarding. I thought it was a great experience." Role-playing in the business law and ethics division taught her "how to act in a business environment in a way that you couldn't really learn through school."

Robert Handelman, who like Grossman is a Grade 12 Tanenbaum campus DECA finalist, hopes to study business at university next year. For the competition, he acted as a hotel manager marketing his hotel to the disabled community.

"It was exciting," he said.

Exchange program brings Israeli doctors to Toronto's SickKids

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The Medical Exchange Program between Tel Aviv University's Sackler School of Medicine and Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children (SickKids) aims to encourage interaction between research and clinical departments at both institutions.

The program is intended to benefit both Israel and Canada, said Moshe Eizenman, a professor of biomedical engineering at the University of Toronto and a member of the executive of Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University (CFTAU) and chair of the CFTAU committee looking after the program.

The Medical Exchange Program (MEP) started in July 2003, he said, largely due to the efforts of Toronto philanthropist Marty Goldberg. At the moment, four disciplines are involved: oncology, immunodeficiency, maternal and fetal toxicology, and plastic surgery and microsurgery.

To date, CFTAU has distributed $650,000 among the four programs.

Ronald Zuker practises plastic and reconstructive surgery at SickKids, specializing in facial paralysis, cleft lip and palate, and microsurgery. He is also co-director of the Facial Paralysis Clinic and a professor in the department of surgery at the University of Toronto.

Zuker said the MEP has three goals. First, he said, it aims to train research fellows at SickKids, who would return to Israel and bring their new outlook and expertise to Ichilov Hospital, the hospital associated with the Sackler School of Medicine.

The second goal of the MEP, Zuker said, includes doing scientific research, to be reported in reputable medical journals.

The program's third goal is to organize conferences to facilitate the exchange of information. There has already been one, and another will be held at the end of April.

Congenital problems, especially cleft lip and palate, occur in one in 600 children, in all races and all groups of people, Zuker said. This aspect of plastic surgery is one of the major training areas, he said.

Benjamin Meilik is this year's MEP fellow. He has been in Toronto since last summer, after a vacation in London, which coincided with the subway bombings.

"My wife and children and I were having breakfast in our hotel, when we heard the blast from the subway next door. Everyone was evacuated into the street. Since I had experience in dealing with emergencies like this, I went down into the tunnel to help," he said.

Stories of his heroism were widely reported, to his acute embarrassment.

Meilik spent several years as a fighter pilot in the Israel Air Force, including a stint in the 1982 Lebanon war. After seven years, he resigned. "That wasn't what I wanted to do all my life," he said.

Meilik attended medical school at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev and interned at Haifa's Rambam Hospital, finishing his residency at Ichilov, where he worked under plastic surgeon Eyal Gur. Gur had worked with Zuker, and was involved with the MEP.

"When I was finishing my residency, I was offered this fellowship. It was like a dream – I grabbed the offer," Meilik said.

He is still in the reserves, and now is a flight instructor. His experiences in the Israel Defence Forces have given him a unique perspective.

"I believe that you can improve the outcomes [of both military missions and surgical procedures] just by changing the state of mind of the person doing the job, examining what you are going to do and what you did. This reduces human error to close to zero," he said.

Meilik designed a project at SickKids that would "consider each operation like a pilot considers a mission."

This involves preparing the case with a checklist, as pilots do before taking off, he said, and afterward having a debriefing. "That way we learn from our mistakes and our strengths."

The surgical team – the attending physician, the fellow and the resident – set the goals of each operation, work out what happens if plans have to be changed and discuss the operation afterward.

Meilik hopes to bring the state-of-the- art expertise he will have achieved in Toronto to Israel, where, he said, he treats both Israelis and Palestinian children – the Palestinian ones for free.

At Sick Kids, Meilik will spend one year doing general pediatric plastic surgery and the second year specializing in cranio-facial plastic surgery.

For more information about the program, call the Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University , 416-787-9930, or e-mail CFTAU@interlog.com.

Lawyer explains how civil suits help fight terror

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

In a quiet voice, Nitsana Darshan-Leitner, director of Shurat HaDin, the Israel Law Center, talks about the first terror-related lawsuit that her organization filed in Israeli court.

Recalling a case that garnered worldwide attention, Darshan-Leitner said that in October 2000, two young Israeli soldiers missed the entrance to their military base and mistakenly drove into Ramallah.

"This was the mistake of their life. They were taken to the police station and beaten to death. Afterward, the police threw the body of one soldier into a mob outside, and the mob tore the body to shreds."

Speaking last week at a downtown luncheon meeting sponsored by UJA Federation's lawyers and accountants division, Darshan-Leitner, 30, said that as a result of that attack, she filed a civil suit in Jerusalem against the Palestinian Authority on behalf of the family of one of the soldiers.

In 2002, the family won a landmark legal victory. The court ruled that a $13 million (US) lien be placed against PA assets held by Israel.

The centre is currently trying to persuade the Israeli government to release the funds to the victim's family.

The centre, a non-political and independent body, is dedicated to providing legal representation and resources for courtroom battles being waged in Israeli, American and European courts on behalf of Israeli terror victims.

Among its activities, it assists hundreds of terror victims in filing civil suits against Palestinian terror groups and their financial patrons. It also seeks to influence government policy and secures legal precedents, as well as track the funding and material support for terror groups in Syria, Iran, Iraq and the European Union; provides emergency legal assistance to Arabs accused of working undercover for Israel against the Palestinian Authority; and organizes educational seminars and missions for professionals to train them to be better informed and effective advocates for Israel.

She told the group, assembled at the law offices of Torys LLP, that her office has a paper trail to prove that an Arab bank in Jordan with $30 billion in assets is funding Hamas.

"In public ads, [Hamas] offered $25,000 to families of suicide bombers. These families received a letter from Hamas instructing them to go to a bank and get their reward."

She took the Arab bank, which has a branch in New York, to court and filed a $5 billion (US) suit on behalf of terror victims, she said.

Nitsana Darshan-Leitner

"The lawsuit had an affect on the Arab banking world. A lot of banks would not transfer money to Hamas, and if the banks stop the flow of money to [terrorist groups], we can stop the flow of terrorism."

Recently, she said, her office began hunting down assets in Europe because it discovered that a national oil company in Iran has $600 million (US) in a Roman bank.

"We filed a motion to seize it in an Italian court, and we had 30 lawyers screaming at the judge not to let us put a lien on the money," she said.

"Unfortunately, the judge refused us the lien, and [shortly after that] the money was transferred to the Far East. The Italian government let the money get away."

Their next step, she added, is to go to Thailand to see if the centre can recover money there.

The Palestinians have assets in different banks across the United States, said Darshan-Leitner, "and we're trying to prove these funds are Palestinian."

Her office is flooded with calls from victims who don't want to be victims, and "we want to help them.

"We can win cases. Recently, we won a judgement of $160 million in a U.S. court on behalf of two young orphans. The case was in the United States because [one parent] was an American citizen.

"We got a judgement against [the Palestinian Authority], and they appealed and lost."

The orphans will not get their parents back, but by winning the suit, "they will get some light in their future," Darshan-Leitner said.

The law centre will continue on with its work, "because we are sick and tired of identifying children by dental records and of seeing children saying Kaddish for their parents, or parents saying Kaddish for their children," she said.

"We are fighting for our national survival. The Torah says not to stand by your brother's blood. Israel cannot afford to do it, and you cannot afford to do it."

The centre is trying to raise funds, she said, "because we don't want to let families down."

Several times a year, the centre sponsors missions to Israel that include briefings by officers in the Israel Defence Forces intelligence and operations branches; observing the trial of Hamas terrorists in an IDF military court; and discussions with Israel's Arab agents who infiltrate terror groups to provide intelligence.

For information on the next mission, set for June 5 to 12, call the Israel Law Center at 212-591-0073, or e-mail mission@israellawcenter.org.

Teacher of Excellence Awards
The mediocre teacher tells.
The good teacher explains.
The superior teacher demonstrates.
The great teacher inspires.
-William Arthur Ward-
We are a group of appreciative parents and citizens who are committed to learning. We believe that curiosity and the desire to learn are inspired at an early age in many places. In order to encourage and recognize learning and excellence in our schools, we will salute ten inspirational Jewish Day School teachers each year in the City of Toronto, with ten $1,000 Teacher of Excellence Awards.
We are looking for teachers who consistently demonstrate
• Excellence - motivating students to achieve their best
• Integrity - consistently thinking, saying and doing what is right
• Respect - treating each student as valuable and full of potential
• Innovation - inspiring students to explore and make choices
Do you know a teacher in a Toronto Jewish Day School who inspired you or someone you know? We invite parents, grandparents, students, former students, school administrators and colleagues to nominate that teacher for a Teacher of Excellence award.
Please visit our web site at www.teacherawards.org to share with us the reasons why your teacher is deserving of a Teacher of Excellence award. Nomination forms may also be requested by phoning 519-621-3620 x2210. Deadline is April 26, 2006.

Hamas may yet negotiate with Israel: ex-general

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The newly installed Hamas government in the Palestinian autonomous areas may yet negotiate directly with Israel, says a former high-ranking Israeli army intelligence officer.

Shlomo Brom, the director of strategic planning for the Israel Defence Forces from 1996 to 1998, said last week that such negotiations, while not imminent, could eventually occur.

Shlomo Brom

In a speech at Temple Sinai under the auspices of Canadian Friends of Peace Now and ARZA Canada, Brom, a retired brigadier general who was also former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak's deputy national security advisor during his premiership from 1999 to 2001, urged Israel to give Hamas time to moderate its virulently anti-Israel program.

But Brom, presently a guest scholar in residence at the U.S. Institute of Peace in Washington, D.C., cautioned that years may elapse before Hamas alters its philosophy.

"For now, it's hard to imagine a dialogue between Hamas and Israel," he said.

Brom, who participated in peace talks with the Palestinians, Syria and Jordan in the 1990s, said Hamas would lose its credibility in the eyes of its supporters if it recognized Israel immediately.

But Hamas may yet alter its position on Israel because of its concern for the welfare of the Palestinians and its utter dependence on foreign aid from the United States, the European Union and Canada, said Brom, who until recently was a research associate at the Jaffee Center for Strategic Studies at Tel Aviv University.

Iran, which has promised to fund the new Hamas regime, can't possibly provide the same level of aid as the current donor states, Brom added.

Despite its refusal to recognize Israel, Hamas must now honour existing Palestinian agreements with Israel and the current ceasefire, he said.

Hamas' call for a long-term truce with Israel under certain conditions is a reflection of its attempt to reconcile its ideology with hard realities on the ground, he noted.

In an analysis of last week's election in Israel, Brom said that voters had a clear choice.

Kadima, led by Ehud Olmert, the incoming prime minister, promoted a unilateral disengagement from parts of the West Bank. The Labor party and Meretz supported a negotiated agreement with the Palestinians, while Likud was satisfied with the status quo.

Brom argued that a unilateral withdrawal from the West Bank will not serve Israel's interests.

"It's an illusion, a mirage."

He warned that Israelis living in and around Tel Aviv and Jerusalem should gird themselves for Qassam rocket attacks should Israel withdraw unilaterally from the West Bank.

In a unilateral pullout, Israel would continue to maintain a military presence in the West Bank, with its system of checkpoints, and thus invite a barrage of Qassams.

By contrast, Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip made sense because of its distance from the Israeli heartland.

The Qassams currently being fired from Gaza at Israeli kibbutzim and the town of Sderot are a "nuisance," but they do not pose a "real threat" to Israel, he said.

Brom suggested that most Israelis support Olmert's unilateral orientation for two major reasons.

They are skeptical that Israel can reach an agreement with the Palestinians, whom they mistrust and not do regard as a reliable negotiating partner.

They are convinced that disengagement would preserve Israel's character as a Jewish state.

Similarly, most Palestinians do not have faith in the possibility of a negotiated agreement with Israel, he noted.

Brom warned that scenarios calling for Israeli Arab villages near the West Bank to be transferred to a future Palestinian state in an attempt to reduce Israel's Arab population are little more than an illusion.

At best, only 200,000 Israeli Arabs out of more than one million could be moved, and in demographic and political terms, this would be a meaningless development and worsen Israel's relations with its Arab minority.

Turning to Iran's ambitions to be an atomic power, Brom said that there is "a good chance" that Israel will attack Iran's nuclear facilities should international diplomacy fail to deter Tehran's efforts to produce nuclear weapons.

Partnering with the Lions Club of Guyana since 1997, Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, sends teams of doctors and nurses annually to Guyana. In addition to donated medical supplies, this year the Ve'ahavta team also carried beautiful hand puppets and encouraging messages from children at Thornhill's Temple Kol Ami School. Standing from left are students Lily Chapnik, David Bernstein and Zacharee Veltri; seated in middle row are Benjamin Kowal, Grade 6 teacher Bina Erdman, Miriam Shendroff and Danielle Zimmer; and sitting in front are Melanie Burman, Daniel Adams and Danielle Frisz.

Better media coverage can help Israel, watchdog says

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Pressuring Canadian media to provide fair and accurate coverage of Israel and the Middle East is important to improve the perceptions Canadians have about Israel, says Dov Smith.

During a lecture at Adath Israel Congregation earlier this month, Smith, executive director of Honest Reporting Canada, a media monitoring service, provided many examples of the way mainstream Canadian media sometime fail to paint a balanced, unbiased picture of the Mideast conflict.

Dov Smith

Nearly 30 Jewish singles in their 20s and 30s attended the lecture organized by Judith Weinroth, a volunteer with Adath Israel Young Business and Professionals Network.

She said the event was one of many intended to get young Jewish single professionals to meet, socialize and network, and she noted that she's creating a website called Jewish Singles World for singles who want to be informed about Jewish events.

In his talk, Smith explained that Honest Reporting monitors coverage of Israel and then responds "in a way that causes the Canadian media to become more sensitive to Israel's predicament and how to cover it fairly and accurately."

After showing a map that depicted the size of Israel in relation to the 22 Arab countries that surround it, he suggested Israel is in the midst of an existential crisis that most Canadians don't grasp.

He said that while Canada is in a dispute with the United States over softwood lumber, "Israel is sitting next to a Hamas government in the West Bank and Gaza that is dedicated to Israel's destruction."

Smith said one of the reasons the media tends to side with the Palestinians is because they are winning the public relations war.

"Unfortunately, or fortunately depending on your perspective, Palestinians and Arabs in general have been more effective than Israelis in [getting their message across.]"

He referred to the so-called Jenin massacre in 2002 and showed a clip in which chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat appeared on CNN and told millions of viewers that 500 people were "massacred" by the Israeli army, when the true number of those killed was later tallied at less than 60 – and most of those were armed Palestinians.

Despite the fact CNN later challenged Erekat about his exaggerated figures and forced him to backtrack, Smith said that if you search the Internet about what happened in Jenin, most sources in the Arab world and even Europe will say Israel massacred 500 Palestinians.

He said one reason why it's easier for reporters to give more negative coverage to Israel than to Arab countries is because many of them are intimidated from doing stories that might shed a negative light on Palestinians and Arabs.

"It is one of the big PR challenges that Israel struggles against, because Israel is a free society, where even the Israeli media attack the government all the time and expose all the terrible things that happen.

"It is much harder to report what is going on in the rest of the Arab world, because they are generally closed societies," he said.

Smith said the effect of the intimidation has leaked onto Canadian campuses, and he used the violent demonstration at Concordia University in Montreal in 2003, when pro-Palestinian groups prevented former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu from speaking on campus, as an example.

"If you speak to the students there, they told me they don't feel that Israel gets a fair hearing on campus because other students just don't understand.

"Students hosted a table on Israel Day and when they asked people, 'How big is Israel?' they said, 'I don't know, the size of China?'" Smith said.

In reality, Israel is roughly the size of Vancouver Island, he noted.

"Our organization thinks one of the most important issue is how media coverage here in Canada influences Canadian foreign policy toward Israel."

He said that when prime minister Jean Chrétien was in power, Canada voted against Israel on more than 100 United Nations resolutions.

Earlier this month, Canada sided with the United States and vetoed a UN motion that would call on Israel to allow Palestinian refugees the right to return to Israel proper.

"Canada has a reputation as a middle power, as a peacekeeper, that the U.S. doesn't have today," Smith said.

"So when Canada changes a vote on something like the refugee question for Palestinians, it actually makes a difference. That is why we are trying to change media coverage, so we can change attitudes and hopefully get Canada to give a bit more leeway to the Israelis when they have to."

He said the best way to get involved in influencing the media to portray Israel in a fair an accurate manner is to become educated about what's happening in the Middle East.

He suggested that when readers find something offensive or inaccurate, they should contact the offending newspaper editor and write concise, specific letters that refrain from ad hominem attacks.

CBC covers Israeli election with depth, nuance

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

While most of the Canadian media reported on the March 28 Israeli elections, the CBC provided special in-depth coverage. The network sent several radio and TV crews to Israel, including The National anchor Peter Mansbridge, producing three days of programming that gave Canadians a clear view into the hearts and minds of average Israelis.

The CBC began its coverage on Sunday, March 26, with feature interviews from Jerusalem and Ramallah by Michael Enright of the radio show Sunday Edition. This included a high-level panel discussion about the significance of the elections with academic and pollster Asher Arian, Jerusalem Post journalist Amotz Asa-El, and political scientist Galia Golan. In Ramallah, Enright interviewed Daoud Kuttab, a well-known Palestinian journalist and media studies professor.

Enright cited the polls predicting substantial victory for Kadima, but thought that things might not go according to plan. After all, he said, "Israeli politics is layered like a Bermuda onion. It is a crazy quilt of raucous coalitions, delicate alliances, marriages and flags of convenience, a thing of contradictions, of contrasts and conflicts."

On March 27, CBC TV Mideast correspondent Adrienne Arsenault provided an overview of the Israeli social and political scene on the eve of the election and followed it with a profile of Russian Israeli voters and their candidate of choice, Avigdor Lieberman, leader of Yisrael Beiteinu.

Mansbridge interviewed a Palestinian family in Ramallah, who maintained that the secular beliefs of people like them will help moderate the Hamas government.

He also conducted sit-down interviews with Aziz Dweik, the Hamas speaker of the Palestinian Legislative Council, and with former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres, who left the Labor Party after a longtime affiliation to run as a candidate for Kadima under Ehud Olmert.

The following night there was a story from Arsenault as she revisited the Hilbergs, a family whom she had profiled during last August's Gaza disengagement, to see how they had fared over the past several months.

The same night, Mansbridge aired interviews he had conducted the previous Friday afternoon with Israelis shopping and working at Jerusalem's Machane Yehuda market. He explained the market had been "the target of two suicide attacks, the first in 1997, a double explosion that killed 16 people and wounded 157. Memories of that day haunt the stalls." He also spoke about another suicide bombing in the market in 2002, his last visit. Images of the carnage reminded viewers of what Israelis had to contend with during those years.

One shopkeeper described the feelings of most Israelis: "They don't want war all the time and to be afraid of the street. They want peace."

In their quest for freedom from fear, Israelis see the security barrier as necessary protection from further attacks. Mansbridge interviewed a young Israeli software programmer, who remarked: "I think [the security fence] is a necessary evil. I think it's very unfortunate. I don't think anybody in this country really wanted it. I think they wanted a negotiation, an agreement where we could reach mutually agreed borders and a peace agreement [with the Palestinians]; but I don't see that as possible, and it's better to have a border with a wall or fence than people dying."

Mansbridge replied: "That's the way many Israelis see the choice. There may be limits to what disengagement can achieve."

An Israeli doctoral student expanded on this theme: "I don't think [disengagement] is a peace agreement; I don't think it's going to bring peace. But I think it... may bring some more quiet and calm to the region in the short term, and I think we should go on with our lives and [the Palestinians] should go on with their lives where one interferes less with another's life."

In capturing these moderate, centrist views, the CBC provided Canadians with a nuanced understanding of the concerns, frustrations and hopes of the majority in Israel – the sort of complex presentation that many people complain is too often lacking in media reports.

Out-migration now seen as normal

Israeli parents are confiding in him that their children are "marrying out and they are not sure what they did wrong."

Gidron suggested Hebrew supplementary schools might provide a means of bringing young Israelis into the community, but they would have to focus on Israeli history, geography – "for them, Israel the land is pragmatic, it's not a dream," he said – and written Hebrew. Tanach could be taught as in Israel, from a historical and cultural perspective, he offered.

Gidron attributed the rise in Israeli emigration to a number of factors. Israelis meet Canadian immigration criteria and so have little difficulty in obtaining visas. Canada is likely the second most popular destination for Israelis, after the United States, he said.

While "we'd be happy if the Israeli community packed up tomorrow and went back home," he said out-migration is now seen as a normal development in a mature country.

As to Israelis' integration into the wider community, Gidron is guardedly optimistic. It will depend on "whether the community is open enough to take in a brother that is a little different, and bring them in as an equal. The community here puts people in 'boxes.' Is the community open enough to make a new box? [If so] Israelis will respond if there is a box built in their way."

JWIC campaign targets domestic violence in community

"There is a Jewish woman you know being abused" is the message of a communications campaign being launched this month by Jewish Women International Canada.

The campaign is designed to challenge the misconception that domestic abuse is not common in the Jewish community.

Three 10-by-20 foot billboards, with the message that domestic violence exists in the community and an image of a distraught woman with a black eye, have been strategically placed along the densely Jewish Bathurst corridor. As well, commercial establishments in the area stretching from Eglinton Avenue to Centre Street have been asked to partner with Jewish Women International Canada (JWIC), which is dedicated to ending violence against women, and place poster-size versions of the billboard in their windows. Synagogues are also being urged to include copies of the billboard in their correspondence with members.

Statistics Canada reports that one in four women will experience abuse at some time in her life. "The time has come for the Jewish community to take responsibility and not sweep this problem under the carpet," said JWIC executive director Penny Krowitz. "All reports show the prevalence of abuse in this community is equal to what exists in the broader one. Contrary to many stereotypes, the rate of abuse is the same regardless of socio-economic level, whether they're religious or secular, or of Sephardi or Ashkenazi origin."

The campaign has been strategically launched in time for Passover, which celebrates Jewish freedom. But JWIC hopes the campaign will also serve as a model for other ethnic groups to take this generally taboo subject into a public forum.

"Minority groups often do not acknowledge woman abuse in their community for fear it may create a negative image with the public," said Krowitz. "The problem is by not 'airing our dirty laundry' we put women at a greater risk."

Studies indicate that a Jewish woman may stay in an abusive relationship five to seven times longer than her non-Jewish counterpart. This is attributed to several factors, including the cultural importance of maintaining a peaceful home and preserving the family unit.

"It is a myth that abuse is only physical," Krowitz added. "Abuse is about control, whether sexual, financial, psychological, verbal or physical. This is one of the reasons the woman featured in the campaign looks as emotionally distressed as physically hurt."

Appreciation for government's principled stand previous agreements and obligations, including the road map for peace."

Because of Hamas' unbending policies, "Canada will have no contact with the members of the Hamas cabinet and is suspending assistance to the Palestinian Authority," he said, adding that the PA must make a "clear commitment" to peace before Canada will end the diplomatic freeze.

Canada blacklisted Hamas as a terrorist group in 2002, so funding it would violate Ottawa's own Anti-Terrorism Act.

MacKay made the announcement minutes after the Palestinian Legislative Council approved the formation of a Hamas-led government. Hamas won a surprise victory in the Jan. 25 Palestinian elections.

Earlier last month, MacKay was criticized for waffling on the issue when he said that "some Canadian aid will continue" to the Palestinian Territories. He later clarified that the government was reviewing its aid programs.

In the same statement last week, International Co-operation Minister Josée Verner said Canada distinguishes between aid to the Palestinian Authority and to individuals.

"Working with our partners and through the United Nations, its agencies and other organizations, Canada will continue to support and respond to the humanitarian needs of the Palestinian people," Verner said. "Canada will also continue to work with the voices of moderation within Palestinian society."

Israel's embassy in Ottawa said it "appreciates" Canada's move. "It is inconceivable that a terrorist organization whose raison d'être is to destroy its neighbour, Israel, would be given international aid," the embassy said in a statement.

In a letter to Prime Minister Stephen Harper, Marc Gold, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, expressed "appreciation for the government's principled stand regarding the newly formed Hamas-led government."

Gold applauded the government's "decision to continue looking for legitimate opportunities to extend humanitarian aid to the Palestinian people," but cautioned that "the mechanisms (NGOs, UNRWA, etc.) by which Canada delivers its aid have proven problematic in the past and there is scant evidence to believe that matters have improved significantly."

Ottawa's decision "is a courageous breath of fresh air," said the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

B'nai Brith Canada also commended the move. "Canada has stood true to its principles by refusing to do business with a terrorist entity whose avowed aim continues to be the destruction of the Jewish state," B'nai Brith said in a statement.

By cutting aid, Canada is demonstrating "global leadership," remarked the Canadian Coalition for Democracies.

But Canadians, the group added, "need to ask if our tax dollars have helped Palestinians to become less dependent on foreign aid and if our influence has diminished the inculcation of hatred in Palestinian education and media."

Canadian Friends of Peace Now said that while it is "tempting" to impose sanctions on the PA, a "better approach" would be for Israel to transfer taxes to the Palestinians and for Canada to maintain aid "in return for Hamas' continued adherence to its ceasefire with Israel."

The Canadian Islamic Congress called Ottawa's decision "a resounding slap in the face to Canadian values," adding that "Prime Minister Harper and his government are saying loudly and clearly that Canada no longer cares about the plight of Palestine and Palestinians... [this] is a shameful devaluation of Canada's international reputation for fair-minded, ethical and constructive diplomacy."

The group further condemned the government for "blindly following the lead of Washington and of the influential pro-Israel Jewish lobby in both [the United States and Canada]."

Since 1993, Canada has transferred more than $330 million to the Palestinians.

The Conservatives' cuts will mean that the following projects are being suspended:

- $6.3 million for a housing rehabilitation and policy development project overseen by Canada Mortgage and Housing and the PA's public works, housing ministry and finance ministries;
- $400,000 for the refurbishment and management of the Ramallah Municipal Industrial Park, a project of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities in co-operation with the City of Ramallah;
- $600,000 from Canada's justice ministry to support an annual dialogue between justice ministers from the PA, Israel, Jordan and Egypt.

Both the New Democrats and the Liberals responded by saying that the $7.3 million in cuts should be redirected in humanitarian assistance in the Palestinian territories.

"The government should, right away, commit itself to maintaining the $52-million in help," Stéphane Dion, the Liberal foreign affairs critic, said.

The Bloc Quebecois called Canada's decision "rushed and cavalier. The Bloc said it doesn't understand how the Harper government can be so certain about the failure to respect commitments when the Hamas government was only sworn in today [March 29]."

Hamas officials expressed dismay with Canada's move.

"We regret this decision. We consider that it has been taken in haste and contrary to the democratic norms and the principles of human rights which are the basis for relations between states," new information minister Yussef Rizqa commented.

"The Canadian government would have been better off meeting with the government that Hamas has formed to discuss and study its program and listen to its point of view," he added.

Harper issued the following statement after a telephone call with Ehud Olmert, whose Kadima party scored a minority win in Israel's March 28 election.

"I spoke... with Ehud Olmert to offer my congratulations on the victory of his Kadima party in [the] elections in Israel. I told Mr. Olmert that Israel would continue to benefit from the strong leadership he has demonstrated over the past few months.

"Canada and Israel enjoy solid bilateral relations and Mr. Olmert and I agreed to work together at expanding them even more.

"Canada remains a staunch supporter of peace in the Middle East and we will continue to work with Mr. Olmert and [PA] President Mahmoud Abbas to reach that goal."

Marc Gold, national chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, also congratulated Olmert.

"The results demonstrate the dynamism and diversity of Israel's democratic process," Gold said in a statement. "The election signals the Israeli desire for a stable and pragmatic approach to security, and a focus on domestic social policy issues such as health care and education.

"We wish Mr. Olmert every success as he embarks on his first task of putting together a governing coalition."

Pro-Israel Muslim speaks out against radicalism

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

During a lecture titled "Why I Support the State of Israel," Nonie Darwish, an Egyptian-born Muslim, spoke out against Islamic radicalism and terrorism at York University last week.

"Being pro-Israel does not mean you have to be anti-Arab. I love my religion. I love my culture," said Darwish, a writer, public speaker and the founder of a website called Arabs for Israel. She was forced to defend herself during the question-and-answer period when a few members of the audience booed her, called her a racist and repeatedly yelled "shame on you."

Nonie Darwish

"The problem is we are going through a difficult period and in order to solve this problem, we need to admit what is wrong with our culture," Darwish said. "I am not here to bash Islam the religion, but call for reformation."

Darwish, who has been speaking out against terrorism since the World Trade Center in New York was destroyed by Islamic terrorist on September 11, 2001, was invited by the Speakers Action Group and Hillel at York to address about 50 people March 29.

"After 9/11 and the London and Madrid bombing, I thought to myself, as an Arab child, was I taught peace? The answer is no. We learned just the opposite," Darwish began.

She was born in Cairo, Egypt, and moved to Gaza when her father, Mustafa Hafez, was sent by the Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nassar to head their military intelligence in Gaza and Sinai in the 1950s.

Darwish's father later started the Egyptian fedayeen movement, the armed resistance, which is responsible for raids that killed more than 400 Israelis between 1951 and 1956.

She told a story about how Israeli soldiers came to her home one night to find her father, but when they discovered that he wasn't home, the soldiers left her, her siblings and her mother unharmed.

"I was very grateful that they didn't kill us, especially because the fedayeen did kill Israeli civilians."

Eventually, her father was killed in what was the Israel Defence Forces' first targeted assassination in 1956. In Egypt, Darwish recalled, Nassar hailed him as a national hero and a martyr.

She said when she was just eight years old, she and her siblings were asked by top Egyptian officials, "Which one of you kids will avenge your father's blood by killing Jews?"

"It created a kind of conflict in my mind that if I don't want to kill Jews that I must not love my father," she said.

As an elementary-school student, Darwish said that the brainwashing continued and she was taught to hate Jews, encouraged to seek vengeance, denounce peace and read jihadist poetry in class.

"They would say things like, 'I wish I could be a martyr and die in jihad.' They filled our hearts with fear of Jews, which made hatred come very easily and made terrorism acceptable," she said.

Darwish said it is convenient for Arab countries to perpetuate the myth that Israelis are to blame for their problems, rather than be accountable, create jobs, and build factories, schools and hospitals.

"They shamed, blamed, and abused Palestinians to fight Israel and never accept peace with Israel. It is in the best interest of the 22 oil-rich Arab countries to keep this conflict going."

She said that when the West Bank and Gaza were ruled by Egypt and Jordan, respectively, the two regions "were neglected and used as launching grounds for war, terror and the destruction of Israel.

"It has now become very convenient to blame worldwide Islamic terror on the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza. But what about the terrorism against Israel that I had witnessed as a child before the 1967 war and before the occupation?"

During her lecture, Darwish referred to the riots spawned by the Danish cartoons that portrayed the Muslim prophet Muhammad, and said that the Muslim response "is just a symptom of a culture that advocates hatred and violence. These actions are far more offensive to the Muslim culture than a cartoon."

She also referred to the "barbaric beheading" of Daniel Pearl, a Jewish journalist who was kidnapped and murdered in 2002 while investigating a story in Pakistan.

"Terrorism is giving Islam a bad name. Mohammed Atta [who led the 9/11 attack] is the one giving Islam a bad name, not me. Not the others who are speaking out like me. Muslims who really love their religion should be on the front lines of the fight on terror."

Darwish ended her lecture with a plea for Muslims to "extend our hands to five million Jews in a sea of 1.2 billion Muslims.

"We always list the things that Israel has to do to change, but we never ask ourselves what can we do to bring peace to the Middle East. It is time to ask ourselves what can we do to bring an end to terror."

During the question-and-answer period, a Saudi Arabian-born student challenged Darwish's views on Arab culture and countered her point about Daniel Pearl's murder. She said she met Pearl's father when he spoke at York last year.

"He was saying the same obnoxious thing, that he was killed because he was a Jew. I think it's untrue because [Pearl's] wife said that... he was not killed because he was a Jew, he was killed because he was a journalist and a foreigner."

Ahmed Habib, the vice-president of equity and services for the York Federation of Students, called Darwish a "rabid racist" and accused her of violating Canadian hate laws by speaking against Islamic fundamentalism.

When a student, coincidentally named Mohammed Atta, asked Darwish whether she thought that the war on terror, a term coined by U.S. President George W. Bush, was terrorism itself, she responded with a question.

"If you knew that there were some people who were going to fly airplanes into buildings and you have a choice to shoot them before they kill 3,000 people or let them do their dirty job – "

"I refuse to answer that question," Atta said, cutting her off.

"See, that's the problem. All you want to do is shame us and the Arab culture is all about shame and pride. They want to shame us, but they don't want to discuss the issues."

Let the joy of your seder last long after the guests go home.

Vandals attack in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Just a couple of days after B'nai Brith Canada released its finding that anti-Semitic incidents had decreased significantly in Montreal during 2005, the exterior of a synagogue and community centre was defaced with multiple spray-painted swastikas, "SS" symbols and a Star of David with a line through it.

The Chai Centre on de Courtrai Avenue at the corner of Westbury Avenue was vandalized overnight on March 24-25. The shocking discovery was made by worshippers coming for Shabbat services.

Rabbi Yossi Kessler said it was the first such problem the centre has had since it opened 13 years ago. Located in a mainly industrial area, the Lubavitch-sponsored centre attracts between 175 to 200 people for services, but many more for its programs for teens and Russian immigrants and its food bank.

Leah Berger, B'nai Brith's co-ordinator of government and community relations, said it would be "tantamount to blaming the victim" to conclude that the incident was linked to coverage of B'nai Brith's announcement to the media of its annual audit of anti-Semitism.

> 'The only way to sensitize and educate the public is to document anti-Semitism and put out a report and get people talking'

"The only way to sensitize and educate the public is to document anti-Semitism and put out a report and get people talking," she said.

In any event, another synagogue, several blocks south of the Chai Centre on Westbury, Congregation Zichron Kedoshim, was hit with similar graffiti earlier in the week. A swastika was also daubed on a utility pole of the Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre, on Westbury, too, apparently on the previous weekend.

An anonymous businessman, described as a non-Jewish francophone, has offered a $3,000 reward through the Sun Youth Organization for information leading to the arrest of the perpetrators.

Police are investigating the incidents, and Berger said B'nai Brith is satisfied the police are taking the matter seriously.

"These incidents bear striking similarities," said Allan Adel, national chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights. "All occurred within the span of one week and in close proximity to each other, in a neighbourhood which is densely populated by elderly Jews. They all featured Nazi graffiti designed to invoke fear in victims."

B'nai Brith is urging anyone witnessing incidents to call its round-the-clock Anti-Hate Hotline at 1-800-892-2624. This information may help police detect patterns they were not aware of, he said.

In 2005 the B'nai Brith audit documented 133 reported case of anti-Semitism in Quebec, including vandalism, harassment and violence, with 127 occurring in Montreal. Although the numbers are down from 2004, B'nai Brith said the incidents have increased by over 60 per cent since 2001, when 78 were reported.

Acceptance rate for Israeli refugee claimants spikes in 2005

151 successfully argued they should be allowed to stay

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada's acceptance rate for refugee claimants from Israel in 2005 was the highest in a dozen years.

Ottawa's acceptance rate last year of Israeli citizens claiming persecution and refugee status was 31 per cent, the highest level since 1994, when it was half of all claimants.

After years of single-digit acceptance rates from Israel, the figures from 2005 hark back to the days when Canada routinely ignored appeals from Israel that it does not produce asylum-seekers.

Figures released to The CJN last week show that in 2005, Canada accepted 151 Israeli citizens who successfully argued they had a "well-founded fear of persecution" should they be returned to Israel.

The Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) finalized 491 cases from Israel, rejecting 269 claims. The rest were either abandoned or withdrawn.

The IRB does not track the reasons, whether political, religious or personal, for granting asylum. Neither does it keep records of the birthplace of claimants.

But Israel has long maintained that for the most part, they are Jews who left former Soviet republics and came to Israel under the Law of Return, which grants them immediate citizenship.

Many stayed a few years and then decided to springboard to other countries as Israel citizens.

Typically, the asylum-seekers allege that while in the Jewish state, they were denied jobs and housing, threatened, ostracized and harassed because of mixed marriages or questionable status as Jews.

Israel has always said that as a democratic, multicultural nation, it does not produces refugees. The Israeli argument has always been that claimants' stories of persecution are spurious and designed to gain sympathy in the West.

Canada's acceptance of refugees from Israel has been a sore point between the two countries since the gates opened for Soviet Jews in 1989. Ever since, Israel has been trying to persuade Canada that ex-Soviets are taking advantage of the Law of Return to come here.

To qualify as refugees here, they must prove they have a credible fear of persecution should they be returned to Israel.

Canada's acceptance rate of Israeli refugees peaked in 1990 at 69 per cent of all claims. The lowest acceptance rate was two per cent, in 1998.

In years past, most of the successful claims in Canada were made in Montreal.

A study released a year ago in Israel showed that some 74,000 immigrants from the former Soviet Union left the country between 1990 and 2000. About 40,000 of those went west.

Israel's absorption ministry reported last year that nearly nine per cent of immigrants from former Soviet republics leave Israel, with Canada being a favourite destination.

The Israeli embassy in Ottawa said it would not comment on last year's figures until it had studied and analyzed them.

A year ago, when the 2004 numbers were released, embassy spokesperson Ofir Gendelman said it was "unfortunate" that some Israeli citizens were "deliberately misleading" Canadian immigration authorities.

Gendelman noted at the time that "in more than few cases," refugee claimants have used fake Israeli passports to enter Canada illegally, and asked for asylum only when they were in danger of being deported.

Cousins carry on Rhodes Pesach food traditions

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Cousins Myriam Brenner and Rachel Cadranel, whose grandparents are from Turkey and Rhodes Island, Greece, have come to Canada via Zaire and South Africa.

"And like all Jews, food is the centre of our holidays. What you eat determines where you come from," Brenner says.

Although many Sephardi Jews from Rhodes eat rice during Passover, they do not, says Brenner, who left Zaire at age seven. "At one time, there was a famine in Rhodes, and the rabbi allowed them to eat rice. They have carried on the tradition."

In South Africa, they say, their family seders were huge. "We never left anyone out. We opened our door to anyone who needed a place. Then, we didn't realize it was a Sephardi tradition. The thought was the same as opening the door for Eliyahu," says Cadranel, who lived in Zaire until she was 18.

They conducted the seder in English, French and Ladino. "Whose ever turn it was to read did it in the language they were most comfortable with, so in that way strangers were always welcome."

Lamb was a mainstay during Passover, "and believe it or not, my mother always served chicken soup with kneidlach. I don't know how she found the recipe. Certainly no one in Rhodes ate kneidlach," says Brenner.

Rachel Cadranel, Alexandra Brenner and Miriam Brenner

A typical charoset was made of dates, raisins, apples, nuts and wine, and the seder eggs were a bit unusual.

"Our eggs were distinctive. Instead of eggs in salt water, we would boil brown eggs with onion peels. If we wanted them even browner in colour, we would add a tea bag to the water. Even the yolk had a brown edge," says Cadranel.

The eggs represent life, and they would never leave a peeled egg uncut, because that signifies mourning, Brenner says.

Their cooking was time-consuming, they say, because everything was made from scratch.

Lamb eaten throughout Passover in Tunisia

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Almost 30 years after leaving Tunisia, Sarah Carlen has clear memories of the lamb her family would buy every year right after Purim.

"I remember growing attached to him and then waking up one morning knowing that this is the day he would be slaughtered. I would cry."

They ate that lamb throughout Passover, she says. "We would have lamb roasts, lamb chops, lamb stew. I still order lamb from the butcher so we can have it for the seder.

"It wasn't just our family. In the weeks between Purim and Passover, we would hear lambs all over the neighbourhood."

She also recalls that they took their mattresses to the beach every year just before Passover to wash and dry them on the sand. "Then someone would come along and restuff them. It was a time for everyone to go to the beach and have fun," says Carlen, who teaches a course about Sephardi culture at York University.

One of her fondest memories, she says, is of the women in her extended family coming to her home to prepare for the seder. "The men went to the market, and the women cooked and cooked. My mother never viewed it as work. She saw it as quality time with her family. I always heard them laughing and having fun. She said she wouldn't change the week for anything."

The seder table was set with a long, embroidered cloth, Carlen said, but the service was held in a different room, which was decorated like a tent with sheets hanging from the ceiling.

"The seder plate – it was actually a wicker basket because Moses was found in a basket – would be set on a low bench and we would sit on the floor or on soft cushions. The men would sit on the side of the wall so they could lean back, and the basket was passed over everyone's head to signify God's protection in the desert."

A traditional Tunisian seder dish is msoki, said Carlen. "They would cook spinach with herbs, coriander, parsley and fresh fava, and either keep it vegetarian or add lamb stew.

"We also had lots of salads – carrot, beets, zucchini or eggplant. For dessert there was fruit, fruit and fruit, and a favourite treat in my home was fried matzah soaked in egg and orange juice, and then eaten with honey. My kids still love it."

When Passover ended and there was time to bake bread, Mimouna began, said Carlen. "We would put up lettuce leaves – they weren't taken down until they dried and fell – to signify a green and prosperous year, and set our tables with bowls of flour, olive oil and fresh fish. We would serve bread and cookies, and anything else we didn't eat during Passover. Everyone left their door open, and neighbours and relatives would visit from house to house.

Then, she said, the women continued cooking, because the day after Passover, the whole community went on a picnic. "We had celebrations from before Passover until after Passover."

MSOKI

¾ lb. lamb or beef
2 lb. spinach
2 lb. fresh fava
1 lb. fresh green peas
2 artichokes, leaves removed
1 small cabbage
2 onions
2 leeks
1 fennel
8 garlic cloves
3 turnips
2 broccoli
3 celery stalks
1 zucchini
3 potatoes
1 bunch coriander
1 bunch dill
1 cup oil
1 cinnamon stick mint
salt, pepper, nutmeg to taste

Clean vegetables, cut in chunks and put in pot with water to cover and 1 cup oil. Cook on high heat until boiling. Add herbs, salt, pepper, cinnamon and nutmeg and stir. After 15 minutes, add meat and mint. Cover, turn down heat and cook for ¼ to 1 hour.

New cookbook addresses all aspects of cooking kosher

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

I have a huge collection of nearly 2,000 cookbooks on my bookshelves and scattered throughout every room of my house. My collection continues to grow because of the many books that cross my desk for review. For the past several months, I had been anxiously awaiting the arrival of Divine Kosher Cuisine by Barbara Wasser and Risé Routenberg as I wanted to review the book for my Passover column. I was totally blown away when I finally received the proofs. What a labour of love!

Divine Kosher Cuisine is due off the presses momentarily and will hopefully be available for your Passover pleasure. It sells for $32.95 (US) plus shipping. For information on ordering, call 518-344-1190 or visit the website at www.divinekosher.com. Don't hesitate to order a copy (or more) as this book will sell out very quickly.

Companion software will be available for $9.95 so that you can scale recipes up or down, create menus or shopping lists and even add your own notes

Divine Kosher Cuisine is a fundraising project of Congregation Agudat Achim in Niskayuna, N.Y. It took Wasser and Routenberg and their committee of 150 volunteers nearly two years to test, perfect and compile this collection of over 400 recipes. Wasser and Routenberg operated the shul's catering division, As You Like It Catering, the premier kosher caterer in the region. They have even prepared dinners for the New York State Legislature and the governor's mansion.

The hard-covered book is beautifully designed, with a special layflat binding for easy use. There are over 200 colour photographs that leap right off the pages… and onto your plate (don't you wish)! The fabulous photos, which were taken by congregant Harvey Mendelson and styled by Wasser and Routenberg, are extremely professional. Divine Kosher Cuisine addresses all aspects of cooking kosher, confronts a variety of culinary and dietary challenges and provides solutions with a flair and confidence that will be appreciated by both novice and gourmet cooks. The authors have paid meticulous attention to every detail to create an outstanding visual and culinary work of art. In fact, the tapestry that hangs in the shul's lobby graces the cover as well as every page of the book to provide a visual feast for the eyes as well as the palate.

Divine Kosher Cuisine brings kosher cooking to the 21st century, with recipes ranging from traditional to trendy, plus many creative new spins on old favourites for everyday, holidays or entertaining. Since both Wasser and Routenberg have children who are vegetarians, they've included a complete chapter of vegetarian recipes and also offer many non-dairy substitutions throughout the book. There are recipes from around the world, as well as a signature dessert section, with elegant endings for special occasions. You'll find helpful hints, wine suggestions, table settings, menu planning, a chapter on catering… in short, something for everyone! There are two full menu choices for each Jewish holiday, with alternatives. Every recipe has a pareve, dairy, meat and/or Passover designation. There are 130 recipes suitable for Passover, and 70 of them are for non-gebrochts dishes which are identified by the key "Non-G." (This refers to some traditions that prohibit foods that mix matzah or matzah by-products with water, known as gebrocht foods.)

The "best of the best" include Greek Charoset, Signature Whitefish, Apple Brie Soup, Potato Cheese Lasagna, Grilled Chicken Breast with Tomato Salsa, Layered Sweet Potatoes and Apples and Signature Almond Horns. Here are some Passover dishes recommended by Wasser and Routenberg for your enjoyment. Chag Pesach samayach!

BAKED EGGPLANT STACK
(Non-gebrochts)

Versatile in every way, this dish may be served with any entree, and used for Passover. Prepare in advance and freeze, baked or unbaked.

Eggplant
2½ lb. eggplant, zebra stripe and cut into ½-in. slices
salt
olive oil for brushing

Preheat oven to 375. Grease cookie sheets. Salt eggplant lightly and place in colander. Press plate over eggplant slices and weight down with cans. Drain 30 minutes. Rinse and pat dry with paper towels. Place eggplant slices on sheet, brush with oil and roast until tender but firm.

Sauce
¼ cup extra-virgin olive oil
4 garlic cloves, minced
2 cups drained canned tomatoes, chopped

Heat oil in medium saucepan and sauté garlic until soft. Add tomatoes and simmer 20 minutes.

Topping
2 tbsp. olive oil
4 garlic cloves, minced
1 large onion, chopped
1¼ cups drained canned tomatoes, chopped
½ cup drained pitted black olives, chopped
2 tbsp. finely chopped fresh parsley, divided
¼ tsp. dried thyme
1 tbsp. lemon juice
salt and pepper to taste

Heat oil in medium saucepan and sauté garlic and onions until soft. Add tomatoes and olives; reduce heat and simmer uncovered, 15 minutes.

Add 4 teaspoons parsley, thyme, lemon juice, salt and pepper.

Assembly

Reduce oven temperature to 350. Grease cookie sheet.

Spoon 2 tbsp. sauce in 6 puddles on sheet. Divide and layer eggplant onto sauce. Cover with topping and remaining sauce. Bake 15 minutes. Sprinkle with remaining parsley before serving. Makes 6 servings.

FRUITED QUINOA PRIMAVERA
(Non-gebrochts)

This "spring style" Italian dish combines the classic primavera veggies with apricots and cranberries mixed with quinoa (pronounced "keenwa"), a creamy white grain. This South American product has a light texture and delicate flavour.

2 cups vegetable broth
1 bay leaf
1 teaspoon salt
1 cup quinoa
3 tbsp. olive oil, divided
1 small zucchini, thinly sliced
1 small yellow squash, thinly sliced
½ cup sliced mushrooms
1 small red onion, thinly sliced
2 garlic cloves, minced
1 tbsp. lemon juice
¼ cup dried apricots, diced
¼ cup dried cranberries
¼ cup chopped fresh parsley
¼ cup chopped fresh dill
salt and pepper to taste

Bring broth, bay leaf and salt to boil in soup pot. Add quinoa and return to boil, cover, reduce heat and simmer 20 minutes or until quinoa absorbs liquid. Remove from heat, discard bay leaf and cool

Heat 2 tablespoons oil in large skillet and saute vegetables until lightly browned. Add to quinoa. Drizzle remaining oil and lemon juice over mixture. Stir in dried fruit, herbs, salt and pepper. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

QUINOA STUFFED ACORN SQUASH

2 large acorn squash, halved and seeded
¼ cup olive oil

Preheat oven to 350. Grease 9 x 13-in. pan. Prepare Fruited Quinoa Primavera.

Cut ½-in. off bottoms of squash. Brush inside with oil. Stuff each half generously with quinoa mixture and place in pan. Cover and bake 45 minutes or until squash is tender. Yield: 4 servings

Passover Food Ideas

Bonnie Stern and Rabbi Elyse Goldstein's 'Kitchen Conversations'

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

Forget whipping, coddling, folding, substituting or buying expensive desserts. For author, teacher and gourmet tour guide Bonnie Stern, Passover baking is nothing to dread. Just mix up a few pure, simple ingredients and everybody leaves your table happy.

At "Kitchen Conversations," held at Kolel recently, Stern and Rabbi Elyse Goldstein made the perfect Pesach-planning duo with Rabbi Goldstein's focus on Jewish custom and Halachah the perfect counterpoint to Stern's coyly offbeat commentary on cooking, kosher, life and love. "Elyse is the only person who talks as much as I do," Stern joked.

If the evening had the feeling of a reunion, it's because Rabbi Goldstein and Stern held a similar session last year, and also co-led the Food for Thought culinary tour to Israel last February. They're planning a second tour this October. Stern said of many culinary tours, her Israel experience with Rabbi Goldstein was the most delicious – but also "so meaningful."

Their lively banter wove through brief baking demonstrations, covering ingredients, customs and personal stories, while answering audience questions about everything from last year's matzah (don't use it, said Rabbi Goldstein) to artificial sweeteners (don't use them, said Stern).

Well, not quite. Some may need these products, Stern said, but too many people are afraid of rich ingredients, treating artificially sweetened products as "free food… and eat as much as they want," instead of genuinely nutritious foods. "I'm not telling you to eat a lot of sugar or butter," she said. "But I'd rather eat a very small piece of something made with natural ingredients."

For Rabbi Goldstein, kosher for Passover includes ecology. "Consider buying free-range eggs," she said. She also offered vegan alternatives to seder-plate classics: an avocado pit instead of an egg, and a roasted beet for the zroah (shankbone).

Both touched briefly on organic ingredients, which, Rabbi Goldstein said, fulfil the Jewish imperatives to care for our bodies and for the earth. "This is something we should be taking seriously."

Stern offered four Passover desserts: Gwen's Almond Haystacks (recipe below), Passover Lemon Pavlova Roll, Caramel Matzo Crunch and Moroccan Sliced Oranges with Dried Fruit, from her latest book, The Best of Heart Smart Cooking.

All four are astonishingly simple: it's hard to believe just a few basic ingredients could wow your guests, but audience reactions to samples revealed that these are tasty magic indeed.

The four-ingredient Caramel Matzo Crunch recipe is available at her website (www.BonnieStern.com) and the Lemon Pavlova roll is a variation on a non-Passover recipe from her book, Bonnie Stern's Essentials of Home Cooking (the original features corn starch, while her Passover recipe uses potato starch).

Stern's Moroccan Sliced Oranges is not so much a recipe as a citrus showcase. "Use every different kind of orange or grapefruit you can find," said Stern. Delicate slices of blood oranges and Cara Cara, a reddish Californian navel orange prized for its low acid and slight cherry flavour, and grapefruit are topped with bits of dried figs, Medjool dates, apricots, pistachios and pomegranate seeds, and drizzled with fresh citrus juice. Though slightly preparation-intensive, it can be made a day ahead and refrigerated.

As for the Almond Haystacks, they're "so easy, you almost can't believe it's this easy," Stern said. Delicate and macaroon-like cookies, they're tasty and quick – no whipping egg whites! and freeze beautifully to always have on hand: a taste of freedom in three simple steps.

GWEN'S ALMOND HAYSTACKS

This cookie, from my friend in Montreal, Gwen Berkowitz, is perfect – really delicious, low in fat, rich with almonds, good for Passover and any time at all.

2 egg whites
½ cup sugar
½ tsp. vanilla extract (optional)
3 cups sliced almonds

In a large bowl, mix (do not whip) egg whites with sugar. Add vanilla if using. Stir in almonds. With a teaspoon, make small mounds of mixture on a cookie sheet lined with parchment paper. Bake at 350 for about 20 minutes or until golden brown. Turn off oven and leave cookies in with the door open for 10 additional minutes. Makes about 30.

Sephardi traditions important

"We did a Mediterranean style of cooking lots of pickled vegetables. A typical Passover lunch would be fried fish, olives and pickled cucumbers," Brenner says.

"Other Passover favourites were 'matzah' French toast, and fried potato fritters made with Parmesan cheese and dipped in honey."

Their traditions are very strong, the cousins say, and they hold on to them to this day.

"It is a very important part of our lives. My kids don't learn Sephardi traditions at school, so it is up to me to teach them the traditions," says Brenner, whose husband is Ashkenazi.

KYEFTES DE PRASA
Leek fritters

2 bunches leeks (8 medium sized)
3 potatoes
2-3 eggs, well beaten
1 tsp. salt
freshly ground black pepper celery or parsley, chopped oil to fry

Remove course outer leaves of leeks. Cut in half lengthwise and across, and wash carefully. Simmer with potatoes until tender, about 15 minutes. Drain well and squeeze excess water from leeks. Mince leeks and potatoes. Add remaining ingredients, except oil, and mix well. Shape into patties about 6 cm in diameter. Shallow fry in hot oil. If oil is not hot enough, the fritters will be greasy. Fry a few at a time to keep the oil temperature high. Drain on absorbent paper. Serve hot or cold. Makes 25.

FONGOS
Spinach and potato bake

2 bunches spinach
4 eggs, well beaten
4 large potatoes cooked and mashed
2 cups grated cheese
salt and freshly ground black pepper
2 tbsp. oil
2 tsp. butter

Wash spinach. Remove stalks and shred leaves finely. Dry on absorbent paper. Place in a large bowl. Add 3 well-beaten eggs, a quarter of the mashed potato, 1 cup of the cheese mixture and seasonings. Place oil in ovenproof dish. Heat in oven for 5 minutes at 180c. Pour spinach mixture into dish. Form 12 mounds of potato-cheese mixture and place on spinach. Dot with knobs of butter. Bake at 180 for 30 minutes. Serve hot or cold as a vegetable, cut into squares. Traditionally served with brown hard boiled eggs. Serves 8

GWÉVOS ENJAMINADOS
Brown hard-boiled eggs

6 eggs
1 tbsp. oil
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. freshly ground black pepper
onion peel (dry, brown outer layers)

Place eggs in pot and cover with water. Add oil, seasoning and onion peel. Bring to a boil, lower heat and simmer for 1 hour for the best flavour. They are always served hot.

Kosher for Passover baby food

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

Last Passover, we had a newborn who was still nursing. This year, with a one-year-old, things won't be nearly so easy. I wouldn't call her picky as much as determined to eat the things she loves and to avoid everything else. Okay, picky.

But we may be in luck. In December 2005, Beech-Nut baby foods arrived in Canada. All but a few of its Canadian products are kosher, and 16 are actually kosher for Passover, bearing the supervision of the Orthodox Union (OU).

"This is a very exciting time for us, launching up there," says Beech-Nut product manager Anne Drozda, who has been coming to Toronto from Missouri to help kick-start the products here.

Beech-Nut isn't the only kosher baby food in Canada. But Heinz dropped much of its kosher baby food line three years ago, and the selection has been sparse.

Some Toronto retailers that carry kosher foods have been importing Beech-Nut from the United States for years, but they cost about twice as much as Canadian brands. Earth's Best organic baby foods and several of Heinz's organic line products bear kosher supervision, but also come with a premium price tag.

Beech-Nut has made baby food affordable again, but you can't get it everywhere. Drozda says that for now, Beech-Nut products will be available exclusively through the Loblaw family of stores: Loblaws, Superstore, Fortino's, No Frills, Zehrs and others.

Kosher has long been "part of our culture," she says. Recently purchased by Swiss food group Hero, Beech-Nut started out over 100 years ago selling "anything that could be put into a can." But for 75 years, it's stuck with baby food exclusively, she adds.

Today, the only non-kosher Canadian products are those with meat. The others are all pareve, with the exception of a dairy vanilla custard pudding which is sweetened only with apple juice.

Keeping kosher and non-kosher separate, says Drozda, starts "right from the growing process."

The OU checks out all pre-processed ingredients, she explains. "If somebody has pureed a product for us, we have to make sure they have koshered all their lines, too."

A supervising rabbi helps plan every stage of production at the company's Canajoharie, N.Y., plant. Because he's participating, the products are considered "bishul Yisrael" (cooked by a Jew), a necessity in some communities.

The rabbi lives an hour away, Drozda says, "so when he comes down, he actually sleeps in the plant… we have a cot for him; he's there pretty much all the time [during kosher production]. Once we're done with the kosher run, we go into the remainder of the products."

Drozda says the company will be cautious about planning any expansion here. In the United States, Beech-Nut offers 124 kosher items, including cookies, crackers and chunky toddler foods; 33 are kosher for Passover. In Canada, there are still only 34 kosher items total.

My baby's favourites? Probably Pears & Rice Cereal, along with Corn Casserole, though I'm not sure why it's called a casserole; it's a jar like all the others. Neither is kosher for Passover, however, so we may still run into food issues this Pesach.

The Passover varieties are mostly pure fruit, so we're going to have to find other ways of offering veggies and carbs. Luckily, she's recently discovered that perennial Pesach treat – the potato. When they're seasoned and baked, we've convinced her they're french fries. Between those and a few dozen jars of butternut squash, we just may make it.

Passover breakfast suggestions

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Breakfast is the most important meal of the day, and during Pesach it doesn't have to be matzah and butter every day. The following recipes are easy and fast, and will kick start your early morning energy level and keep you going until lunch.

POACHED PEARS WITH ALMONDS

Make this recipe ahead of time and serve it all week.

4 to 6 red-skinned pears (may be under ripe)
½ cup sugar
orange juice to cover
2 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tsp. grated lemon rind
½ tsp. ground ginger
¼ cup sliced almonds
whipped cream

Peel pears and scoop out core from blossom end with a melon baller. Don't remove the stem. In saucepan, mix sugar, orange juice, lemon juice, lemon rind and ginger. Bring to a boil. Place pears in syrup. Bring to a second boil. Cover and simmer 10 to 15 minutes, depending on ripeness of pears, until barely fork tender. Remove pears from syrup, cover both with plastic wrap and refrigerate. Serve one pear with sauce and garnish with a bit of flavoured whipped cream and sliced almonds or any tasty fruit sauce.

PESACH BREAKFAST COOKIES

1 cup ground almonds
2 cups ground walnuts
¼ cup raisins
1 cup sugar
2 whole eggs
1 egg white
1 tsp. vanilla
1½ tsp. cinnamon
pinch of salt

Preheat oven to 350. In a bowl, combine all the ingredients and mix well. Let the mixture rest for 20 minutes. Drop by large teaspoonfuls on a parchment-lined cookie sheet. Bake for 10 minutes until lightly browned. Let cool a bit before removing to a baking rack. Makes 2 dozen.

BANANA PANCAKES

3 large eggs
½ cup matzah meal
2 tbsp. matzah cake meal
2 tbsp. sugar
¼ cup sour cream (can be low fat)
¼ cup cottage cheese, small curd (can be low fat) dash salt
1 ripe banana, mashed

In a bowl combine the eggs, matzah meal, matzah cake meal, sugar, sour cream, cottage cheese and salt. Mix well. Add the banana and mix well. Heat oil in a skillet and spoon the batter into the pan 3 pancakes at a time (the batter will spread). Turn when sides are cooked and the middle is bubbly. Serve with syrup. Serves 3 to 4.

MIXED FRUIT SMOOTHIE

½ cup orange juice (or grapefruit or apple juice)
1 large banana
1 cup peaches, drained
1 cup whole frozen strawberries
½ cup canned pineapple, drained

Combine all the ingredients in a blender and process until smooth. Makes two big servings. You can add your own variations, such as fresh peaches, papaya or coconut for a tropical taste. Just make sure you keep the banana, the whole frozen strawberries and the juice.

Israel Election 2006

Labor launches surprise bid to form coalition

By GIL HOFFMAN
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Labor Party leaders decided late Sunday not to hold meetings with representatives of right-wing parties in an effort to convince them to ask Israeli President Moshe Katsav to call on Labor head Amir Peretz to form the next government.

Peretz's attempt to form a coalition with right-wing parties turned the political scene upside down on Sunday and put into question the assumption that the next government would be formed by acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, whose Kadima party gained the most seats – 29 versus Labor's 19 – in last month's election.

Both parties met with Katsav Sunday and both nominated their leaders as the next prime minister. Coalition talks could not begin until Katsav had made his choice.

Israel's Basic Law does not obligate the president to appoint the leader of the largest party to form a coalition. He could choose another party head whom he believes could form the most stable government.

In a late-night meeting Sunday called by the Labor chairman, Labor heads agreed that they would not keep other parties from asking the president to nominate Peretz, but that those parties would be doing so of their own volition.

The decision came following a Likud Party demand that Labor formally request support for a Peretz premiership if it wanted the Likud to consider it.

In an unexpected political turnabout, when the National Union-National Religious Party and Meretz were to visit Katsav on Monday, the rightist NU-NRP said that it would recommend that Katsav ask Peretz to form a "socioeconomic emergency government," while the leftist Meretz is expected to recommend an Olmert-led coalition.

The NU-NRP faction based its decision on the assumption that Peretz would preserve the status quo on diplomatic issues and refrain from implementing Olmert's plan to withdraw unilaterally from most of the West Bank. Meretz leader Yossi Beilin vowed not to sit in a government with the right and expressed anger at Peretz for considering the idea.

Kadima officials noted that during the election campaign, Peretz was quoted as ruling out forming a government with the right because "such a cynical move would harm my credibility and ideology."

Olmert's associates said they hoped that Peretz would "stop acting childish, come to his senses, realize his mistake, give up his attempts to form a coalition and accept Olmert's offer to meet with him." They warned that Olmert could decide to avenge Peretz's behaviour by forming a coalition without Labor.

"There is no chance that a government without Kadima can be formed," Kadima MK-elect Shimon Peres said. "Purim lasts only one day. Eventually you have to take off the costume and decide with whom you want to sit and with whom you don't."

The Gil Pensioners Party decided Sunday to recommend that Olmert form the coalition, but Shas and the Likud delayed their scheduled meetings with Katsav until Tuesday to see how other parties act, and Israel Beiteinu officials, who recommended no candidate to Katsav on Sunday, said they would convene on Monday to reconsider their decision. The delays are expected to force Katsav to hold another round of meetings with faction heads before deciding who should form the government.

A prospective Peretz-led coalition would have included the 70 MKs of Labor, Shas, United Torah Judaism, Meretz, the Likud, NU-NRP and Gil.

Labor secretary-general Eitan Cabel, who led the Labor delegation to speak Sunday with Katsav, had said that Peretz was serious about the move and confident that he would be the next prime minister.

"In this election the public did not unequivocally determine the largest party," Cabel said. "This is the first time that the leading party has won less than 30 seats. Our figures show that there is more than one government option. There's a possibility for a socioeconomic emergency government."

[Israel and Israel Sun photos]

But other Labor MKs scoffed at the idea, calling it "empty posturing to drive Kadima's bargaining price down."

The Likud faction deliberated whether to recommend that Peretz form the government or to endorse no candidate. Likud chairman Benjamin Netanyahu, who would be a senior minister in a Peretz-led government, is said to favour the first option.

"I feel more comfortable with Peretz's policies that call for negotiations with the Palestinians than with Olmert's plans to withdraw unilaterally," Netanyahu confidant MK Yuval Steinitz said.

But MK Reuven Rivlin criticized the idea, saying it was not worth the risk of harming Likud's credibility. "I think we are playing a dangerous game, and we cannot go with Labor unless it makes serious concessions to us so we will not have so little in common," he said. "The nation decided it wanted the Likud in the opposition, and that's where we should be."

Following in the footsteps of a charismatic leader

Comment

By SHLOMO AVINERI
Jerusalem Post

Ehud Olmert is no Ariel Sharon. He lacks Sharon's military experience, his charismatic presence, his brutality and his frightening cunning. And Olmert's reputation as a sharp-tongued polemicist and wheeler-dealer has not exactly endeared him to the Israeli public.

Yet he has managed to step, albeit gingerly, into Sharon's shoes in the three months since the latter became incapacitated. Except for boasting, once, that the campaign had already been won – a statement that must have cost Kadima dearly – he did not make any mistakes during his difficult pre-election stewardship as acting prime minister. More than that, he went out on a limb and courageously delineated his credo for further Israeli unilateral steps vis-a-vis the Palestinians.

Few people, in Israel or abroad, have been thrown into such a cauldron. But Olmert won the election, though less resoundingly than he and his new party had expected, and he is now his own man.

He will have to stitch together a government coalition under less favourable conditions than the inflated public opinion polls suggested. And the comparison with Sharon will continue to haunt him.

Yet one can recall interesting cases in recent history of apparently grey, run-of-the-mill politicians who succeeded charismatic giants and won their place in the hearts of their people and in the pages of history.

In Israel, for example, the lacklustre Levi Eshkol became prime minister after David Ben-Gurion's angry second and final withdrawal from power. The quintessential compromiser, whose favourite drink was said to be "half-coffee, half-tea," became one of Israel's greatest prime ministers.

With little military experience but with a wisdom partly innate and partly gained by experience, he was responsible, as head of the government and minister of defence, for preparing the Israel Defence Forces for what turned out to be its most crucial and finest hour: its victory in the 1967 Six Day War. At the same time, he succeeded – despite some visible slips in orchestrating crucial U.S. support for Israel's decision to pre-emptively go to war.

In the United States, there are two examples of post-charismatic leaders who excelled in their roles: Harry S. Truman and Lyndon B. Johnson.

When the charismatic and popular Franklin Delano Roosevelt died in April 1945, just before the end of World War II, few people had ever heard of his vice-president, Harry S. Truman. And among those who had, many held a low opinion of his abilities. A party hack, a machine politician from the Midwest saddled with some shady political deals, a failed businessman – he lacked all of the the revered Roosevelt's apparent qualities: an aristocratic demeanour and polish, wealth and culture, a lofty and at the same time popular, rhetorical style, and an obvious love of the nation.

Yet Truman was the American president who stabilized the post-1945 world. He made the wrenching decision to use the atomic bomb against Japan; imposed a tough occupation regime on defeated Germany and Japan, which helped them with their successful democratic development; rescued Europe's shattered economies through the Marshall Plan; and stood up to Stalin and Soviet communism.

Few people who saw him at his first international conference in Potsdam, where he appeared almost hapless, thought he was of the stuff of which great statesmen are made. And yet, he went on to become one of the 20th century's greatest American presidents.

In a similar fashion, the plebeian Texan, Lyndon Johnson, succeeded the suave and charismatic John F. Kennedy in one of America's darkest moments. Yet he was able to ensure continuity. And while today he is remembered for the Vietnam debacle, few recall that it was Kennedy – the prince of Camelot who first dragged the United States into that Southeast Asian quagmire.

Johnson's greatness lay even more in that he was a southerner who pushed through the major transformation of American domestic politics that finally gave American blacks their civil rights as equal citizens of the republic.

Civil rights were never at the centre of Kennedy's agenda. For all JFK's appeal to the liberal, educated upper middle class, it was Johnson, a somewhat shady wheeler-dealer, who assured African Americans their place in the sun. He combined vision and earthiness with the political muscle needed to achieve a resounding victory for equality and human decency.

There is no guarantee that Olmert will develop in the mould of Eshkol, Truman and Johnson. On the other hand, for those who find it difficult to wean themselves from larger-than-life charismatic leaders, these examples carry a clear message: some of the most significant achievements in modern democracies have been gained under the stewardship of non-charismatic leaders who were able to combine their wisdom and judgment with the ability to pursue successfully the responsibilities with which they found themselves saddled by the inscrutable developments of history.

Likud to investigate election failure

By GIL HOFFMAN

Likud supporters show their disappointment with the election results last Tuesday [Israel Sun photos]

TEL AVIV — The Likud party decided unanimously on Sunday to adopt MK Michael Eitan's proposal to form a commission of inquiry to investigate its fall from 40 seats to 12 in last week's election.

Eitan will present a list of committee members, none of whom will be current MKs, to the faction in upcoming days. Likud chairman Benjamin Netanyahu came under fire after the meeting from MKs who were upset that the issue of the party's electoral failure was limited to the last five minutes of a two-hour meeting.

"It's a bad joke that after such a colossal loss they are pretending like it's no big deal," said one participant in the meeting at the Likud's Tel Aviv headquarters. "[Netanyahu] is trying to brush off the inquiry as if it's an annoying obligation. We didn't discuss who the commission members will be, their mandate or timetable. They can sit for three years."

Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin said he favoured the commission of inquiry because he wanted to know whether the party's downfall was connected to the disengagement plan, Netanyahu's economic policies or another reason.

"After every failure you have to see what brought us to this disaster so we can learn our lessons," Rivlin said. "Were people punishing us or deserting us? I think the people of Israel will return, but we have to find out why they deserted us."

The long awaited clash between Netanyahu and his number two, MK Silvan Shalom, did not happen in the meeting. Shalom decided not to say anything about the election, because so little time was allocated to the topic after two hours of deliberations about whom the Likud should support to form the next government.

Unlike Friday's Likud faction meeting, the MKs refrained from attacking each other. Participants said they learned their lessons from headlines after Friday's meeting in which MK Dan Naveh called MK Gilad Erdan a "little pisher" and Shalom requested that Netanyahu's spokesperson Ophir Akunis be removed from the room because he attacked Likud MKs on the radio while continuing to receive a salary from the party.

The soul-searching and name-calling were all a result of the big bang set off by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon when he bolted Likud to form the Kadima party.

The move flattened a party that had governed Israel until this fall, but earned only 12 seats in the election and very nearly lost its position as the country's leading right-wing party.

Sources close to Shalom said after the election that Netanyahu had destroyed the party and could no longer remain its chairman. Shalom himself boycotted a late-night Likud faction meeting at party headquarters in Tel Aviv after the results were in, opting instead to stay at his Ramat Gan home to plan his next move.

Yet Netanyahu vowed to stay on as leader, despite speculation he would resign if he failed to win at least 15 seats.

"I am committed to continuing in the way that we started to ensure that the movement will be rehabilitated," he declared just after 11 p.m. on election night, describing the initial results as a "hard hit" after the "first blow" when Sharon left the party.

"We will unite our powers and stick to our path and return the Likud to leading the state," he maintained. "We will see better days."

The crowd, which had earlier expressed shock and despair over early returns, broke into cheers at his announcement. Several party stalwarts also backed his decision to stay at the top, though no one said it would be easy.

"As a leader he should stay and rebuild the party," said MK Gideon Sa'ar, who headed the party's public relations team. "I don't think it's the right thing to do right now, to start another series of internal conflicts within the Likud."

Many Likud MKs cited the major internal division – between Sharon and his Kadima backers and those who remained in the Likud – as being responsible for Tuesday's poor showing.

Eitan went further, saying, "We are all responsible."

Eitan, MK Uzi Landau and other senior Likud members ruled out participation in a Kadima-led coalition.

But some candidates did express criticism of Netanyahu, and many suggested the party will have to take stock and change tack.

Ahead of the vote, Rivlin told the Jerusalem Post that while Netanyahu had attracted those who "worship him and appreciate him," there were "others [who] hate his guts."

Many blamed him for the economic hardships caused them by his policies when he was the finance minister in the last government. "He became one of the symbols that brought misery to many people," Rivlin said. "We have lost many people who believed that the Likud championed the poor people."

Danny Danon, who was too far down on the Likud list to hope to enter the Knesset, said it was up to the next generation of voters to turn the party around.

"We as the young leadership of the Likud need to check [within ourselves] what we need to do to improve our movement," he said. He predicted that "the next elections will be sooner than we think."

Fewer women elected to 17th Knesset

By GREER FAY CASHMAN
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — While women have gained greater prominence in legal circles and as company directors, they have made no headway as legislators.

In fact, there will be fewer women in the 17th Knesset than there were in the 16th. Several women who were among the 18 in the previous Knesset failed to gain re-election, and the women who are among the new faces in the Knesset failed by one to make up the difference.

In the 16th Knesset, Likud boasted the largest female representation with seven women MKs prior to the defection of Tzipi Livni and Ruhama Avraham to Kadima.

Labor was second with four women MKs until Dalia Itzik moved over to Kadima. Shinui started out with three women MKs, but was reduced to two following the death of Yehudit Naot. Meretz, the National Religious party, Am Ehad and Yisrael B'Aliya had one woman each.

Gila Finkelstein of the National Religious party was not returned to office, nor was Ilana Cohen of Am Ehad, which was Amir Peretz's party before he returned to Labor. Marina Solodkin, who was elected on a Yisrael B'Aliya ticket moved over to Kadima, while Meretz MK Zahava Gal-On managed to win another term despite her party's loss of mandates.

Likud MK Naomi Blumenthal, who has been sentenced to eight months imprisonment for bribery and obstruction of justice, refused Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu's request to take her name off the list for the 17th Knesset, but given the results of the elections, she would have been out even if she had not been convicted.

Kadima, with six females, has the largest number of women in the 17th Knesset. Headed by Livni, the list includes Solodkin, Itzik, Abraham, Ronit Tirosh and Amira Dotan. Labor has five women: Yuli Tamir, Sheli Yacimovich, Colette Avital, Nadia Hilo and Orit Noked. There are three women on the Yisrael Beiteinu list – Esterina Tartman, Sofa Landver and Lia Shemtov. Limor Livnat remains the sole woman on the Likud list and Gal-On is the only woman on Meretz's.

One of the new faces in the Knesset is that of Sarah Merom-Shalev, of the Pensioners party.

Of the new female MKs worth watching is Labor's Nadia Hilo, a third-time-lucky candidate, after two previous failures to get into the Knesset.

Hamas takes over, pledges 'battle'

By KHALED ABU TOAMEH
Jerusalem Post

GAZA CITY — The day the Hamas cabinet took office in the Palestinian terrorities, Khaled Mashaal, the Damascus-based Hamas leader, promised the Palestinians "a dignified and proud life behind the resistance in defence of their honour, their land and their pride."

He told Al-Jazeera: "Our battle is only against the Zionist occupation."

Hamas ministers entered office on March 28, after ceremonies at which the outgoing ministers wished them success and promised to help them carry out their duties.

"Today, Hamas took control of all the ministries," said Minister of State Atef Udwan. "The new ministers will start implementing their policies immediately."

Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar chose to begin his new career by launching a scathing attack on the United States. "The U.S. is biased toward Israel, guilty of crimes against the Muslim and Arab world and is widening the rift between the American people and those of the Middle East," he said

Zahar, who replaced Nasser al-Kidwa, a nephew of former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat, said Hamas would not cave in to international pressure to change its ways and that it had no plans to negotiate with Israel.

Referring to a statement by U.S. President George W. Bush that Washington would provide no aid to a PA government headed by Hamas unless it changes its extremist policies, Zahar said the comments were in line with American support for Israel in the United Nations and its massive aid to Israel.

"America is committing big crimes against the Arab and Islamic countries," he told the Associated Press. "This new decision will intensify the gap between the American people, American interests and the Middle East in general. America is giving $3 billion annually to expand settlements and to confiscate our rights and our land."

He also condemned as "immoral" Canada's decision to cut off aid to the new Hamas government.

"Is the Canadian state willing to starve the Palestinian people while the Israelis are committing major crimes against Palestinian industry, Palestinian society, the Palestinian economy, occupying their land?" he asked. "Is this is a moral principle according to which Israel should be blessed and supported by the Canadian government and people?"

Zahar said Hamas would seek new international alliances beyond its traditional Arab friends. "The new channels will be Africa, Asian countries, including China, and the South American continent, for assistance politically and also financially," he said.

Salah Bardawil, spokesperson for Hamas in the Palestinian Legislative Council, also attacked the U.S. decision to ban contact with the Hamas cabinet. He said the decision would not contribute to stability in the region because it sided with Israel.

"This is an unjust decision that would deprive the U.S. of the possibility of acting as a neutral party," he said.

Hamas spokesperson Sami Abu Zuhri urged the Canadian government to reconsider its decision, saying all the funds from the international community would be spent for the welfare of the Palestinians. "Despite this decision, Hamas is interested in establishing relations with Canadian officials," he said. "Canada can't ignore the results of the democratic elections."

Taysir Umran, a senior Hamas official in Nablus, described the U.S. position on the Hamas cabinet as a "fatal blow to the 'road map' [peace plan] and the Quartet." (The Quartet is made up of the United States, Russia, United Nations and European Union.) This position does not serve the cause of stability in the Middle East, he said.

Chief PA negotiator Saeb Erekat expressed fear that the West would boycott the Hamas cabinet in the same way it boycotted Arafat in 2002

"Unfortunately, this would take us back to the period when the U.S. and the EU decided to cut off their ties with Arafat and isolate him," he said, urging the international community to continue financial aid.

"What is important is that the donor countries continue their aid to the Palestinian people," he said.

Former cabinet minister and Fatah legislator Muhammad Dahlan also condemned the Canadian decision, saying it was "a form of collective punishment against the Palestinians because of their democratic choice."

The smooth transition of power was marred by statements made by outgoing interior minister Nasser Youssef, who announced that most of the PA security forces would report to PA President Mahmoud Abbas and not the new interior minister, Said Siam.

Youssef's announcement drew sharp criticism from Hamas leaders, who said that Abbas did not have any jurisdiction over the security forces. According to Youssef, the new interior minister would have control only over the civil police, civil defence and the Preventive Security Service. The other security forces, such as Force 17, military intelligence and general intelligence, as well as the National Security Forces, would remain under the control of the PA chairman.

Siam reiterated that the cabinet would not arrest gunmen or dismantle militias

"We will not put our sons in prison for political membership or resisting occupation, because occupation is the reason for the problem," he told reporters. "At the same time, we will reach an understanding with all strugglers to take into consideration the national interest, on the basis that resistance is a legitimate right."

The new cabinet's first challenge will be to pay the salaries of more than 140,000 civil servants. Finance Minister Omar Abdel-Razeq said last Thursday that he saw no problem with March salaries being paid but gave no time frame. His predecessor, Jihad al-Wazir, said employees should be paid by mid-April

Five die in heavy rains, floods

Unseasonable heavy rains across Israel on Sunday caused flash flooding and chaos on many roads. In one weather-related accident in the Jordan Valley, three people were killed after a driver lost control of his car and collided with another vehicle. In Wadi Ara, above, near the town of Umm al-Fahem, a 23-year old Arab-Israeli woman was killed when her car was swept away in a deluge of mud and water. A Palestinian man, 26, from the West Bank village of Beit Anan was also killed when his car was swept away near the village of Bil'lin. In the busy Megiddo Junction, near Hadera, police and rescue workers had to help scores of motorists from their cars when they became caught in the torrent. Overall, more than 11 centimetres of rain fell in Jerusalem and 7 cm fell in Tel Aviv. The Sea of Galilee also reportedly rose 1.5 cm in a span of 24 hours. More heavy rain was forecast for the next few days.

Deadline announced for slave labour compensation

The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany announced last week that under German law, Sept. 30 is the last day that payments from the German Foundation, "Remembrance, Responsibility, and the Future," will be made to eligible Holocaust survivors and heirs of survivors who have applied to the Conference's program for former slave and forced labourers.

No new applications for payments from the German Foundation can be made. Only claims filed before the deadline that remain open are being processed.

You must contact the Claims Conference if you are a Holocaust survivor, or heir of a survivor, who submitted a timely application to the program for former slave and forced labourers and:

- have been approved for payment, but have not received the full payment; or
- have not received notification about the status of the claim; or
- have received an heir application packet and have not yet returned the required forms.

If a person eligible for payment dies, the person's heirs must notify the Claims Conference within six months of the death of the eligible person or by Sept. 30, whichever is sooner, in order to receive payment.

All time limits related to appeals and to heirs that have not expired as of Sept. 30 terminate on that date.

All communications to the Claims Conference described above (other than regarding appeals or heir deadline notification) must be postmarked by May 15 and must arrive at the Claims Conference no later than June 1.

These deadlines also apply to the German Foundation fund for medical experiments and other personal injuries.

The U.S. court supervising the Swiss Banks Settlement Slave Labour Class I has adopted the administrative deadlines of the German Foundation.

In cases where the result of a timely appeal for a payment was negative but documentary proof of eligibility was located by the applicant subsequent to the appeal decision, it may become possible to review the earlier decision. Applicants must contact the Claims Conference appeals office in communication postmarked by May 15, and that communication must arrive at the Claims Conference Appeals Office no later than June 1. Applicants are asked to keep written proof of the date of mailing, fax or e-mail communication.

Canadians can obtain more information by contacting, Claims Conference, 15 East 26 St., Room 906, New York, NY, 10010, USA. They can also call 1-646-536-9100, fax 1-212-679-2126, or e-mail info@claimscon.org.

'Quartet' warns Hamas

The "Quartet" working for Mideast peace warned the new Palestinian government to recognize Israel and renounce terrorism if it wants financial aid. The statement by the diplomatic body composed of the United States, European Union, Russia and United Nations came one day after a Hamas-led government was sworn in by the Palestinian Authority. The new PA foreign minister, Mahmoud Zahar, has said Hamas has no plans to change its policies on these issues. The European Union currently gives the Palestinians $600 million (US) a year. Zahar also accused the United States of crimes against Muslims around the world.

Bush warns Palestinians

Palestinians must choose if they want a government that wants to destroy Israel, U.S. President George W. Bush said. "The Palestinians must make a choice as to whether or not it makes sense for them to have a government that says they want to destroy their neighbor," Bush said last week. "I don't think it does." Bush fielded questions at Freedom House, a Washington group that assesses democratization throughout the world. A woman who identified herself as a Palestinian refugee asked Bush, "Why is the United States punishing us and cutting funds for people who chose fair and free elections?" The United States is cutting funding to the PA after the terror group Hamas assumed power following PA elections in January. Bush replied, "I think that aid should go to suffering Palestinians," but not to a government that "has expressed its desire to destroy its neighbour."

Gaza rocket fired at Israel

For the first time, Palestinian terrorists fired a Katyusha rocket at Israel from Gaza. The factory-made rocket, described in Israeli media as a Russian-made Katyusha, landed near Ashkelon last week but caused no casualties. Islamic Jihad claimed responsibility for the launch, but declined to elaborate on how the rocket got to the Gaza Strip. According to Israeli security sources, the rocket, which has a maximum range of 15 miles, fell short due to a faulty launcher.

IDF targets Katyusha terror

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz ordered the army to increase its pressure on terror groups, specifically Islamic Jihad, which claimed responsibility for last week's Katyusha rocket attack from Gaza. "The launching of the Katyusha is very grave and severe, and it demands decisive and unequivocal actions to dismantle this terrorist infrastructure," Mofaz said. The defence minister ordered the security forces to do all they could to "get their hands" on those behind the attacks. He stressed the need to target those who planned the attacks, those who launched the rockets and those in possession of the weapons.

Suicide attack kills four

Four Israelis were killed last Thursday night after a suicide bomber blew up inside an Israeli car near the gas station at the entrance to the settlement of Kedumim in the northern West Bank. According to Kedumim Regional Council head Daniella Weiss, the four Israelis killed included an elderly couple from the settlement, another Kedumim resident later discovered in the vehicle, and a girl from the centre of the country. The army said it appeared Israelis travelling in the car picked up a Palestinian hitchhiker with an explosive belt who blew himself up as the car travelled near Kedumim. The Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades took responsibility for the attack, saying the bomber was Ahmad Mashrake, 24.

Saudi lauds Osirak attack

Israel's 1981 attack on Iraq's nuclear reactor was "probably" fortunate, Saudi Arabia's ambassador to Washington said. Asked last week whether the Saudis now welcomed the 1981 attack on Iraq's Osirak nuclear reactor, given Iraq's subsequent aggression against Kuwait, Turki al-Faisal answered, "Probably, yes." Faisal appeared caught off guard by the question, which came when he called on Israel to disarm to create a nuclear-free Middle East. "We all know that Israel has atomic weapons and that's why removing these threats from the Middle East on a uniform basis would serve Israel's purpose as well as the rest of the countries in the area," he said. Israel's attack on Iraq was widely condemned at the time.

Jewish refugee campaign goes to the EU

By JOEL CLARK
JTA

BRUSSELS — Jews who fled Arab countries following the creation of the State of Israel have taken their demands for restitution to the European Union.

More than 20 delegates from Jewish communities in seven countries gathered in Brussels recently under the auspices of the International Rights and Redress Campaign, meeting members of the European Parliament to discuss their demands.

The global campaign aims to raise international awareness of the heritage of Jewish refugees from Arab countries and to document human rights violations and loss of assets.

The campaign's official launch had been due to take place during Passover, but the sudden incapacitation of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in January and Israeli elections delayed the launch until November.

Organizers hope to bring worldwide attention to the issue in November through the media, political lobbying and education.

The campaign was launched by the U.S.-based Justice for Jews from Arab Countries, in conjunction with the World Organization of Jews from Arab Countries.

"We want to underscore the fact that Jews were also victims of the Arab-Israeli conflict and should be recognized as such," said Stanley Urman, the campaign's director. "It's an injustice to recognize one victim population but not another."

At least 850,000 Jews lived in Arab countries in 1948, but fewer than 8,000 remained by 2001. Two-thirds were absorbed into Israel, while some moved elsewhere.

Most fled or were forced to leave their homes after the creation of the State of Israel in 1948, receiving little or no compensation from Arab governments for their considerable assets.

The campaign seeks to register all these refugees and to preserve their testimony at a special unit of Israel's Justice Ministry.

Organizers are targeting the United States, Russia, United Nations and European Union – the four members of the diplomatic Quartet working for Israeli-Palestinian peace – to put the issue on the international agenda before the campaign is officially launched.

> Campaign focusing for now on securing international recognition that there were Jewish refugees from the Arab world

Frederique Ries, a member of the European Parliament, met delegates in Brussels and said she would work to put the issue on the EU agenda.

"Although this was not a new issue to me, most" Parliament members "will be unaware that there were in fact more Jewish refugees than Palestinian refugees," Ries said. "This is a question of justice, and I welcome the representations that have been made to put this on the agenda."

Urman said the campaign was focusing for now on securing international recognition that there were Jewish refugees from the Arab world, and that human rights violations took place.

Next month, a bipartisan resolution will be proposed to both houses of Congress requiring all U.S. officials to make references to Jewish refugees alongside Palestinian refugees whenever the issue is raised in an international setting.

Organizers have held preliminary talks with Russia and are hoping to meet Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov in the near future.

Nessim Hamaoui, who was forced to leave Egypt in 1958, travelled to Brussels from his home in Sao Paulo.

"I'm here not just for myself, but for the one million other Jews who were expelled from their homelands after 1948," Hamaoui told JTA. "We had our homes, our hopes and our dreams there. All that vanished, and it's time to bring justice to the refugees."

The International Rights and Redress Campaign is supported by Jewish communities in 33 countries.

Julien Klener, president of the Consistoire, an umbrella organization for religious Belgian Jews, welcomed the meeting in Brussels.

"Somehow the existence and history of Jewish refugees has been forgotten over time, and the Palestinian issue has been overstressed," he said.

"I don't know what to do with this child anymore!"

– BY GADY ILANOV

DAVID'S teacher burst into the principal's office, a picture of frustration and despair. "He doesn't sit still for a minute and constantly disrupts the class. We'll have to find another school for him!" She walked out, leaving her unhappy-looking charge in my office.

I am the principal, and though I couldn't get David to tell me what the problem was, he was quick to agree it was time for lunch. When he finished his meal, he quietly said, "I'm just so hungry. So hungry, all the time. When my stomach hurts from hunger – I can't sit still."

I swallowed tears of pity, understanding immediately the cause of his misbehavior. After arrangements with other organizations proved to be of a temporary nature, I was grateful to find an effective solution at Meir Panim.

Today, our school receives hundreds of nutritious and filling, warm lunches from Meir Panim. Thank G-d, I can walk down the hallways knowing that behind the doors of their classrooms, no child is suffering from hunger due to the terrible recession Israel is experiencing.

The above account is a true story related at the recent Meir Panim Carlebach Concert by Ayala Hagage, principal of a school in Israel. Name has been changed to protect child's privacy.

Israel's economy is in crisis. More than 1.6 million(!) Israeli adults and children live below the poverty line and cannot afford basic daily meals. In these impoverished homes, the holiday spirit of freedom and happiness is tangibly and painfully absent.

Meir Panim Relief Centers operates 14 dignified soup kitchens serving about 5,900 people a day, a Meals for Children program currently delivering 8,000 meals daily (a mega-kitchen facility being built in the Negev will feed 50,000 children every day), 21 Power of Giving Centers that distribute refurbished housewares, furniture, and appliances, and many more desperately needed social services throughout Israel. Local branches continue to be established in distressed locations statewide.

MORE THAN one in three Israeli children live in poverty, according to a report issued by the NII. Meir Panim's nourishing lunches feed 8,000 disadvantaged children every day.

And on Seder night, Meir Panim will host a beautiful Seder for the poor in banquet halls at each of our 14 restaurant locations. Please call our office at 514.907.2569/416-628-9685 or visit our website at www.meirpanim.org to learn more about the peaceful revolution Meir Panim has successfully launched against extreme poverty in Israel – or send your warmhearted donation today to 5764 Ilan Ramon Cr., Montreal, Quebec, Canada H4W-3L4.

The smiles created by your kindness are the most fitting tribute to your generosity and love for the children of Israel!

TAU expert working on early-warning system for bird flu

By MATTHEW KALMAN
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — In a nondescript corner of an anonymous administration building on the campus of Tel Aviv University (TAU), Yossi Leshem has been using the latest satellite technology to track the movements of a couple code-named Princess and Jonas.

For nearly a year, Israeli experts were able to track the pair as they left their adopted home in Germany and set out on their travels. Jonas traversed Europe to southern Spain, where he spent several months before rejoining his partner back in Germany. Princess journeyed east across Turkey and Lebanon, passing through Israel, the Palestinian territories and Egypt before making a long stopover in Sudan. She then continued on to South Africa, returning to rendezvous with Jonas in Germany 235 days later.

For more than five years, Leshem has been tracking the travels of Princess and Jonas and dozens like them. He worries that their apparently benign wanderings could inflict death and devastation across the world, at a cost of untold numbers of human lives.

Princess and Jonas are white storks, the long-legged waterfowl that nest in Europe during the summer and migrate south for the winter. Princess is among an estimated half a billion fowl that fly over Israel twice a year on their way to and from their nesting grounds.

Until now, the spectacular arrival of vast flocks of birds in the Hula Valley in northern Israel had been regarded as a nuisance for the farmers, whose seed they feed on – and a beautiful twice-yearly attraction for thousands of bird-watchers from around the world who flock to Israel to see the storks, pelicans, vultures, and even eagles.

But with outbreaks of deadly avian flu in East and Southeast Asia, Africa and Europe, and closer countries such as Turkey and Egypt, Leshem says the fascinating journeys of birds such as Princess and Jonas could be the key to understanding how avian flu might spread around the globe. Every autumn, birds from northern Europe and northeast Asia fly south, soaring past the eastern Mediterranean region before fanning out across Africa and the Arabian Peninsula, then fly the same route in reverse every spring. The resulting crush creates an avian air-traffic jam above Israel twice a year.

"Birds infected with avian flu originating in the Far East are funnelled through the Israeli 'bottleneck' as the birds migrate, and the virus can be passed through the air," said Leshem, an air force colonel. "If a flock of migrating geese land near a chicken farm, the virus can spread like fire."

"The biggest threat is a mutation of the virus and its transfer to people," said Leshem. "We know that birds are disease carriers. It could be a worldwide disaster."

To date, the H5N1 flu virus has killed 95 people out of 175 confirmed human cases worldwide. Those deaths have occurred in a swath from China to Turkey, according to the World Health Organization.

Perched on a hillside near the Latrun junction, about 800 feet above sea level in the foothills of the West Bank, Gen. Leonid Dinevich recalls the days when he commanded 40 Soviet air bases, 500 warplanes and silos containing thousands of ballistic missiles.

Back then, he occupied a spacious office at the top of a 14-story tower at a base in Kishinev in what is now Moldova. Today, Dinevich, 64, spends nine hours a day in an MMR-5 radar station, a camouflaged hut on wheels with a 15-foot antenna circling slowly in a huge sphere mounted on the roof. The cramped interior is alive with blinking lights, computer screens and buzzing equipment.

"Once a general, always a general," said Dinevich. "Today, I am the general of millions of birds, defending against the new enemy of avian flu."

Dinevich and Leshem established the Latrun radar to track migration patterns and warn aircraft of birds in their flight path to avoid collisions. Now they hope that the data collected at Latrun will be developed into an early-warning system to help halt the spread of disease.

"We want to create a network with radar stations here in Israel, in Russia, in Bulgaria, in Turkey, in Jordan – and many more," said Dinevich. "We have to unify them into a single system. On the screen you can see millions of birds on their way to Turkey. We can warn our friends in Turkey that tomorrow the birds will reach there, and they must cover up their poultry and other domestic birds. Then Turkey needs to warn Russia, and so on."

In keeping with the international nature of the threat, the Israeli experts have been working closely with regional colleagues.

Imad Atrash, director of the Palestine Wildlife Society, said the avian flu threat has brought together Israeli and Palestinian officials at a time when co-operation between the two governments on many other issues has come almost to a standstill.

"There is full co-operation," said Atrash. "We are all aware that the disease will make no distinction between Israeli, Palestinian, Christian, Muslim or Jew. We all face the same problem. It will affect everyone. Disease knows no boundaries."

Three weeks after its discovery in the country, Israeli and international health authorities are being cautiously optimistic about their progress in combating bird flu in the region, despite the fact that they are still unable to predict its spread, according to Israeli and Jordanian Health Ministry representatives.

The nature of the disease still makes it "almost impossible" to predict where it will appear next, according to Yair Amikam, deputy director-general for information and international relations at the Health Ministry. "So far, we still don't have any accurate reason we can put our finger on regarding the spread of the virus," he said, adding that health authorities have as yet been unable to narrow down the list of potential carriers, which could include anyone who had been close to the point of contact.

But Amikam said that Israel had been anticipating the arrival of bird flu for more than a year, and had high praise for the way the plans have been followed so far. He pointed out that some hiccups have been reported, including problems with the proper method for the disposal of dead birds, but "generally, we acted fully by the rules we wrote and distributed to the farmers," he said. More than one million birds have been culled, but there is still no way to predict how long the threat will last, he added.

Meanwhile, bird flu was discovered Friday in a kibbutz near the Israeli-Egyptian border. The government quarantined Kibbutz Kerem Shalom and parts of the surrounding area, and will begin culling some 20,000 turkeys there, Ha'aretz reported. The discovery brings the number of Israeli communities infected to eight.

Arab press more anti-Semitic than ever

By HILARY LEILA KRIEGER
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — The Muhammad cartoon controversy greatly increased the amount of anti-Semitic material in Arab and Muslim newspapers, according to a report issued by the Anti-Defamation League last weekend.

The report highlighted cartoons and opinion pieces that demonized Jews, Israel and the Holocaust in media across the Arab world and in Iran.

The publications cited depicted Jews in "outrageous and deeply anti-Semitic caricatures and themes, including anti-Semitic conspiracy theories of Jews plotting to control U.S. foreign policy and dominate the world," the report said.

For example, in the government daily Al-Ittihad from the United Arab Emirates, a cartoon of a Jew holding the world at bay with a gun labelled "the Holocaust" was published on Jan. 24. And, in an apparent reference to the Muhammad cartoons, on Feb. 16 the Bahraini Akhbar al-Khalij ran a picture of an ink pot marked with a Star of David accompanied by a pen writing "cartoons harming Allah's messenger."

While anti-Semitic tropes have long filled the Arab media, ADL Israel office spokesperson Arieh O'Sullivan said the intensity of such material "skyrocketed" when Muslim rage exploded over the controversial Muhammad depictions carried in the Danish press and elsewhere.

"Suddenly it caught on like wildfire and every newspaper started to print content that was anti-Semitic or Holocaust related," O'Sullivan said. He added that the worst of the conflagration seemed to be over, as the Muhammad cartoon uproar has died down.

The report also included content from newspapers published before the Danish cartoon controversy erupted at the end of January – though the Muhammad cartoons were published in early fall.

The turning point came when an Iranian newspaper aped the Danish newspaper's Muhammad contest by sponsoring a competition for Holocaust cartoons, according to the ADL.

ADL national director Abraham Foxman said that Muslim and Arab leaders have a "blind spot" and a "level of tolerance" for "blatant anti-Semitism" in the media.

"While the Muslim world acts out violently in response to the Muhammad cartoons and suggests that western freedom of speech has gone too far, the plain fact is newspapers in the Muslim and Arab world continue to engage in vicious stereotyping of Jews."

New treatment for prostate cancer undergoing trials

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

An effective, non-invasive treatment for prostate cancer that has few if any side effects and can be administered on an out-patient basis is undergoing clinical trials in Toronto, Montreal, London, Ont., Israel, Britain and France.

Prostate cancer is the most common cancer in men, and the second cause of cancer death.

The drug, Tookad (Hebrew for "warmth of light") was developed by Avigdor Scherz, a professor in the department of plant sciences at the Weizmann Institute of Science. Clinical trials in Toronto are being overseen by Dr. John Trachtenberg, professor of surgery and medical imaging at the university of Toronto, who holds the Fleck Tanenbaum chair in prostatic diseases at the University of Toronto and the University Health Network, and is director of the Prostate Centre at Princess Margaret Hospital, where the clinical trials are being carried out.

At a reception last week at Princess Margaret Hospital sponsored by Weizmann Canada, the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation and Steba Biotech, the pharmaceutical company sponsoring the trials, Trachtenberg and Scherz said that the latest trials were very promising.

"After one treatment, half showed no signs of prostate cancer, there was only one adverse reaction." The rest of the 56 patients treated in the clinical trials at the three sites in Canada "showed no side effects at all," Trachtenberg said.

Conventional treatment, he said, has about the same 50 per cent success rate, but the side effects, which may include rectal injuries, blood loss, incontinence or impotence, can be devastating.

Tookad is a photosynsensitizer (meaning that it is only activated by bright light), made up largely of bacterium chlorophyll, the substance that makes plants green.

Since it is light sensitive, Scherz said, it can be directed at cancer cells and then activated, and will not affect surrounding cells.

Also, it clears the body in a very short time, enabling the patient to recover quickly.

Tiny needles are inserted into the blood vessels of the prostate gland, and fibre-optic cables are threaded through the needles. Tookad is delivered through the cables. Intense laser light is flooded into the area and the drug is activated, leaving the cells adjoining the needles untouched.

Trachtenberg said trials so far have been on patients who had previously been treated for prostate cancer, but whose tumour had returned. The plan is to begin clinical trials on those having the cancer for the first time.

The problem is, Trachtenberg said, that many people have tiny tumours in their prostate glands, and in 80 per cent, the tumours are very slow growing. Since prostate cancer tends to strike older men, chances that the tumours will grow enough to be a problem before the person dies are extremely slim.

Treatment, then, is usually reserved for those who really need it. However, the psychological strain of knowing that the tumours might possibly grow lead some men to seek treatment anyway

Host of the program was CITY-TV news anchor Mark Dailey, himself a survivor of prostate cancer. Greetings were brought from Suzy Charbit, on behalf of Negma-Lerads and Steba Biotech; Lionel Robins, chair of the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation; and philanthropist Murray Koffler, a long-time member and supporter of Weizmann Canada.

Q. I recently lost my husband. Now that I am on my own, I know I will not go to the trouble of making a proper dinner, and I'll likely end up eating a bowl of cereal for dinner. Do you have any suggestions?

A. This is a common problem for many people who live alone, at all ages. I often have single patients tell me that they ate popcorn, ice cream or cereal for dinner, but there are ways around this. The most important key is to make it easy for yourself. You are not likely going to invest much time or make a big mess, but you can still eat a substantial and well-balanced dinner.

One great tip is to make use of leftovers. For example, if you are having a crowd for a family dinner or party, make extras and freeze them for yourself. Let's say you've made soup, chicken, turkey, brisket or meatballs. Make more than you need and freeze the extra food in individual portions. This way you can pull out one portion easily, thaw and heat it, and add a canned, frozen or fresh vegetable or bagged salad for a complete meal.

Even if you are not preparing for others, you can still cook in large quantities. Maybe you want to make a big pot of meat sauce, a lasagna, some soup, etc. Make lots, and again, freeze in individual portions.

If cooking isn't your thing, then consider stocking up on some frozen entrees. There are many different ones, from lasagnas to chicken and vegetables to salmon and rice, and much more. These make no mess and can be heated in five minutes. Also, stock your pantry with canned soups, fish and vegetables, which give you easy ways to round out a meal.

Another great option is this: when you get to the grocery store, buy a whole cooked chicken. Have some that day and some the next day. Then cube the leftovers and freeze them. Later you can toss them into a salad, stir fry or pasta.

Remember too that a nutritious dinner may look more like lunch. Try omlettes or eggs, frozen cheese blintzes, cottage cheese and fruit, or a tuna, salmon, egg, turkey, roast beef or peanut butter sandwich. Add some fruit or vegetables and you're ready to eat.

If you do end up having cereal once in awhile, make sure it's a whole grain one so that you get some fibre. Finish the milk in the bowl for calcium and protein, and throw in some fresh or frozen fruit.

Finally, try to make plans to eat with company each week and you will likely end up having a larger, more balanced meal.

The Chametz Hunt

"I get to hide one!"
"I want to hide one!"
"Me too!"

"Be careful!" warns Ima. "Wait until I finish wrapping them up."

I guess I should explain what's going on. Tomorrow night is Passover. We're going to have a massive family seder. My grandparents are coming, and so are Uncle Alan and Aunt Saralee. Add to that my father, my mother, all my brothers and sisters Sam, Leora, Chani, Daniel, Miri, Rachel and my baby brother, Gavriel wow, it's going to be great. But that's tomorrow night. Tonight, we search for chametz. You see, for the last week or so, we've been getting the house ready for Passover. Ima really put us to work, making us clean up the house and get rid of all the chametz.

I know, I must really be driving you crazy, talking and talking about this chametz stuff, without telling you what it is. So you know what? I'll tell you. I'm going to start from the beginning. When you mix flour and water, you get dough. If you let the dough sit for a little bit, it starts rising, getting bigger and puffier. That's chametz! And on Passover, we don't eat chametz. We don't even leave any chametz lying around. And guess what? Just about everything in the world with flour in it is chametz! Cheerios, bread, spaghetti, cookies, you name it! So what do we eat on Passover? Matzah! That's the bread you get when you bake dough before it has a chance to rise.

Sounds scary, huh? Don't worry, it's not as bad as it sounds. There are a million ways to eat matzah. Crumble it into a bowl, sprinkle it with some sugar, add milk and you've got matzah cereal. Make a cream cheese and matzah sandwich. Fry some – it's called matzah brie. Coat your matzah with chocolate for a great dessert.

But here I am, letting my thoughts wander, when I'm supposed to be telling you what's going on tonight. Now that the house is clean, and free of chametz, we do one final check. We turn off all the lights, and my father searches by candlelight for any overlooked chametz. But we've done such a good job cleaning that he probably won't find any. And what fun is a chametz hunt without finding anything? That's why we hide chametz around the house beforehand. Of course, we wrap it up so it won't get all over the place and ruin our careful cleaning. And that's why Ima's wrapping up little bags of Cheerios, to give us so that we can hide them. I can't wait till it's my turn. I thought of the best hiding place.

"Okay," Ima says, "the bags are ready." Of course, everyone lunges for the bags at the same time. "Children!" calls Ima, and everybody freezes. "Everyone will have their turn to hide a bag. Youngest to oldest. Gavriel, you're first."

Everyone laughs. Gavriel's too young. He would probably eat the Cheerios, not hide them. "All right, how about Rachel?"

Rachel sprints down the stairs, clutching her bag. A minute later, she's back.

"Where'd you hide it?"

"Under the fridge," beams Rachel. Ima writes, "#1 Under Refrigerator," on an index card. That way, if Abba can't find it, we'll know where it is.

"Okay Miri, your turn." I hope Miri won't think of my hiding place. She doesn't. "#2 Behind the Picture."

Then it's Daniel's turn. "#3 In the Coat Closet." Now it's my turn! "#4 In the Window Blinds."

Then Chani, then Leora, and finally Sam.

"There are three left," Ima declares. "I get to hide those." And she does, everyone following her around, giving her advice on where to put them.

Finally… "Abba! We're ready!"

Abba comes out of his study, casting glances around the room.

We go around shutting off the lights. Abba lights the long wax candle, and recites the blessing "Blessed are you God King of the Universe who has commanded us to eliminate chametz."

The search is on.

Everything looks different in the flickering candlelight. You can see little clumps of dust that you wouldn't notice in regular light. Abba finds #6 Under the Table right away, and deposits it into the bag he's holding. #2 Behind the Picture is discovered soon after. Abba looks around some more, then goes into the next room!

He missed mine!

He finds #3 In the Coat Closet without too much effort, and then, to everyone's surprise, he finds a cookie underneath the recliner. Well, that's why we're doing the search.

Abba heads back to the dining room to find the last two bags. He carefully examines in, around and behind everything, until he finds… #4 In the Window Blinds. Awww… I wanted mine to be found last.

Well, now there's only one to go, and Ima looks worried. I glance at her card. Everything is checked off except for Rachel's #1 Under the Refrigerator. Wait a minute, Abba looked there already! Oh no, what could have happened to her bag?

Suddenly, the candlelight falls on a Cheerio, sitting in the middle of the hallway. Abba is picking it up when he sees another one. And close by are two more. Uh oh, I didn't think our cleaning job was that bad. Abba follows the trail of Cheerios up the stairs, and there, crunching away, is Gavriel, blissfully holding bag No. 1.

Fun stories that make you think

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Did you ever hear the word "parable"? A parable is a short story that teaches a lesson. Sometimes the story is sad and sometimes it is funny, but we can always learn something from it.

Sheldon Oberman, a Winnipeg man who wrote some wonderful books for children, collected a lot of stories that have been told by Jews, and often other groups of people as well. The book is called Solomon and the Ant and other Jewish Folktales (Boyds Mills Press, 2006).

One story about Solomon tells of a young girl, Hannah, who was very poor. She stopped to savour the delicious smells coming out of a bakery, and the baker, who was not a nice person, demanded that she pay him for the smells that she had enjoyed.

The two went to King Solomon to settle the matter. King Solomon said that indeed the baker should be paid. He told the girl to shake the money in her purse. Then he said that she had paid for the smell of the food with the sound of money.

Not all the stories are about Jews. One is about a poor man in an Arab country who was so hungry that he stole a loaf of bread. The sultan sentenced him to death. Just as the executioner was going to cut off his head, the beggar yelled that he had a magic seed, that would grow into a giant pomegranate tree.

The problem is that the seed could only be planted by someone who had never stolen anything in his whole life. All the important people around, even including the sultan, admitted they had stolen something.

The beggar said, "I never took a country or a horse or even a toy. I only took a loaf of bread because I was starving."

The sultan pardoned him and gave him a job as a royal gardener.

There are some stories that don't teach a particular lesson, but just show how smart – or sneaky – someone is.

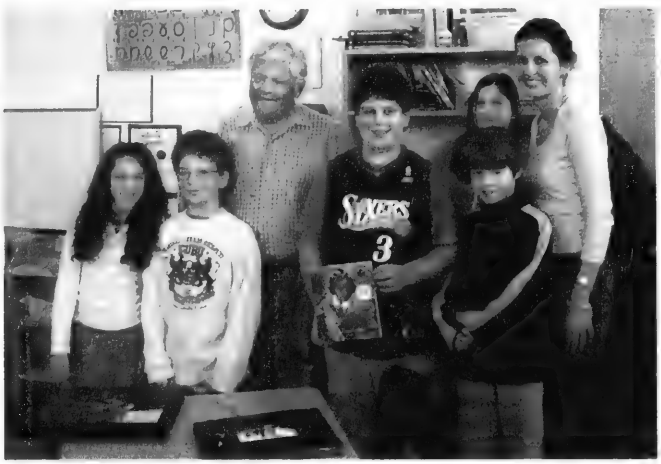
Hershele Ostropolier, a very clever but very poor man, once went to an inn and asked for a meal. The innkeeper, who probably knew Hershele, refused. Hershele threatened that if he didn't get some food, he would have to do what his father did.

The innkeeper got scared, since he thought that perhaps Hershele's father had killed someone or done something just as bad, so he gave him a big meal. When Hershele sat back happily, the innkeeper timidly asked what his father had done.

"He went to bed hungry," Hershele replied.

Oberman also has some stories about Chelm, a fictional town where the people are very good and kind but extremely stupid. They do things like trying to save money by not feeding their cow and then being astonished when the cow dies. In one story, a Chelm judge sentences a fish to death by drowning.

Oberman unfortunately died before the book came out, but the stories and the lessons are a fitting tribute to him.



HOLOCAUST STUDY: Recently, five students from the Montessori Jewish Day School's upper elementary class (grades 4-5) went to see the play Hana's Suitcase to learn about the Holocaust. They were so intrigued that they searched out and called George Brady, Hana's brother and a Holocaust survivor, and invited him to speak to their class. Pictured with Brady, third from left, are, from left, Laura Nahmias, Josh Nahmias, Adam Pasternak, Yoni-Shalom Rohn-Pascal, Gabby Pribluda and teacher Irene Mihelic.

Show addresses teen angst and awkwardness with humour

By KYLE GORDON
Special to The CJN

For many children, going away to camp is the highlight of the summer, but this was not the case for Amy Salloway.

"I was sent away to camp against my will. My parents boarded me on a bus and sent me off to camp for eight weeks," Salloway said.

Now, a Minneapolis-based solo performer, Salloway revisits that traumatic summer at a Jewish camp in her new one-woman play, So Kiss Me Already, Herschel Gertz! which she performs at the Oh Solo Mio festival in London, Ont., April 6 and 8.

Salloway used the setting of a camp as a backdrop to develop the ideas of alienation and the search for identity.

As the outreach co-ordinator for a Jewish Minnesota congregation, Salloway heard stories from fellow congregation members about feeling alienated from their religion as a child and their inability to bond with the Jewish faith.

"I thought, oh my God, this is exactly what I grew up feeling. The feeling of being a misfit in every way, even in spirituality," she said.

The show is about the desire to rise above the feeling of isolation, she said.

"I felt this way when I was 15, at summer camp, and this is how I feel now. It never changed."

In the show, the character of Amy is pining for the boy she loves – her best friend who sees their friendship as strictly platonic. Meanwhile, at camp, she begins dating Herschel Gertz. But she doesn't feel the same way about him.

"He doesn't have that sparkle or magic that she is looking for, and she knows she feels that for the boy at home," she said.

The show is loosely based on Salloway's own experiences of loving someone she can't have and being able to have someone she doesn't love.

"I have maintained that friend, buddy, pal status for my entire life. It's terribly depressing. It's pathetic," she said.

She said there are times she goes home after performing the show and sits with a bag of potato chips and realizes that her feelings of low self-esteem haven't changed.

"I wrote this show about me at 15 and what has changed? Nothing," she added.

Salloway said she never uses her writing as a form of therapy. She thinks it would end up showing in the performance and possibly make the audience uncomfortable.

"They [the characters] are part of my life, but I can still view them artistically and put them in a different theatrical context," she said.

Mary Hirsch, a close friend of Salloway's, said So Kiss Me Already, Herschel Gertz! addressed the themes of angst and awkwardness in an entertaining and hilarious way.

"We all had that horribly awkward moment when we were a teenager wondering about our first kiss, and when it happened we thought 'that's it?'" said Salloway.

Hirsch also said she has noticed a tremendous amount of growth in Salloway since her first solo performance, in 2003, in Does This Monologue Make Me Look Fat?

Salloway has become more comfortable talking about herself. "I think she has really developed as an actress. She is a great writer and performer, and that is a really unique quality," Hirsch said.

Ten Commandments mini-series on TV

By TOM TUGEND
JTA

The story of the Exodus makes for great cinema and stunning visual effects, as Cecil B. DeMille and Charlton Heston proved half a century ago.

Now The Ten Commandments, with its timeless themes of slavery and freedom, faith and doubt, adultery and fidelity, battles and miracles, has been shaped into a four-hour miniseries by ABC-TV.

It will air in two two-hour segments April 10 and 11, and should draw good ratings in the Passover and Easter season.

The 2006 Ten Commandments easily outscores the 1956 Heston epic.

With commercials, the miniseries is actually slightly shorter than the original three-and-a-quarter hour film, but is by far the more subtle, credible and engaging of the two.

The basic plot is familiar from the Bible. It starts with the rescue of baby Moses from slaughter to God's choice of Moses as liberator, the 10 plagues, the giving of the Ten Commandments at Mount Sinai, 40 years of wandering in the desert and Moses' death in sight of the Promised Land.

Veteran producer Robert Halmi Sr. and director Robert Dornhelm have gone to considerable lengths to authenticate the biblical scholarship, dress style and physical setting of the drama, with Morocco substituting for the Sinai Peninsula.

The casting draws heavily on the British Isles, with Scottish actor Dougray Scott as Moses, Linus Roache as his brother, Aaron, and Welshman Paul Rhys as Ramses, the stubborn pharaoh.

Scott portrays a complex Moses, a man chosen against his will by God and tested almost beyond endurance, torn by the punishments he must inflict, badgered by his stiff-necked tribe, and yet rising to pre-destined greatness.

Omar Sharif as Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, may be the most familiar face to viewers. Argentina's Mia Maestro is an attractive Zipporah, Moses' wife, though Dornhelm largely avoids DeMille's penchant for making all Egyptian and Jewish maidens look like America's Next Top Model hopefuls.

Scriptwriter Ron Hutchinson has introduced some telling analogies between the biblical story and the current human condition in Moses' constant emphasis that "to be a free man, you must stop thinking like a slave and think like a free man."

The TV drama's faults tend to be minor, though a bit much is made of the supposed sibling rivalry among Moses, Aaron and Miriam.

Family fun in Kamloops and at Sun Peaks Resort

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Sun Peaks is B.C.'s largest ski resort outside Whistler.

Visitors to the Rockies are familiar with Kamloops, the third-largest city in British Columbia, as they often spend a night there.

But Kamloops, in the province's interior, is well worth a much longer stay. The city offers visitors a host of family activities all year round, not to mention breathtaking natural beauty, including 1,000 lakes where holidaying families can be assured that the fish will be biting!

Kamloops is known as the "Tournament Capital of Canada." Four major highways – the Trans-Canada, Yellowhead, Coquihalla and Highway 97 – lead many sports teams to the city. Kamloops is a four-hour drive from Vancouver and seven from Calgary.

The city offers full-service air and rail connections, which comes in handy when the city puts on events that attract people from all parts of the globe.

The Kamloops Festival of the Performing Arts runs for about three weeks commencing the third week in February. The film festival and the Kamloops Festival of the Performing Arts both run simultaneously at the beginning of March, followed by the very popular Kamloops Cowboy Festival. This festival showcases cowboy art, country music and cowboy poets from as far away as the state of Texas and city of Nashville.

Families can be kept extremely busy during their stay in Kamloops. Activities offered there include rock-hounding, fossil-hunting and gold-panning tours, available through the Kamloops Rock Works Ltd. For those who enjoy fishing, Gord Honey's operates a fly-fishing guide service. A family can spend a day at The Ranch in Pritchard, about 45 minutes away from the city. It's a family-owned operation where you can take a hayride and feed the animals. Be sure to ask to see the amorous goat or the peacock who likes car hoods, and have a barbecue there. Food is provided or you can bring your own.

Kamloops offers year-round activities

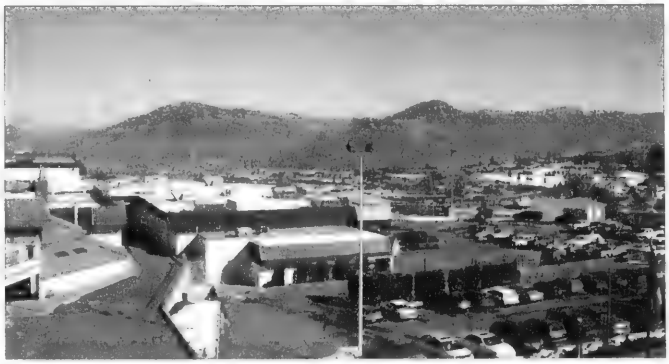
Kamloops Heritage Railway boasts of bringing steam back. Its train, No. 2141, was built in 1912 by the Canadian Locomotive Company in Kingston, Ont., for the Canadian Northern Railway. Since September 2001, the train has been used by Kamloops Heritage Railway to operate tours.

Train tour destinations include Armstrong, which is known for its cheese. There are also very scary Ghost Train tours and the Spirit of Kamloops offers a ride back in time. Some adventure tours the railway offers include a stagecoach ride with some real Old West surprises – yahoo!

The Secwepemc Museum and Heritage Park is just east of the Kamloops Pow-Wow Grounds, on the Kamloops Indian Reserve. The museum houses both indoor and outdoor exhibits, including an outdoor botanical garden. Indoor exhibits allow visitors to learn about the history of the First Nations Secwepemc or Shuswap peoples.



Kamloops is known as the "Tournament Capital of Canada." [Kathryn Kates photos]

Not to be missed is the British Columbia Wildlife Park, where 65 species, including grizzly bears, cougars, goats and a "kissing" moose, roam.

The newly enlarged and renovated interactive Discovery Centre at the park includes an Eco-Inquiry Gallery with interactive displays, from which the entire family can learn about British Columbia's wildlife.

Also found in the Kamloops area are many golf courses. There are a number of cattle ranches, some of which welcome visitors. They include the Douglas Lake Cattle Company, just 40 minutes from Kamloops.

For shopping, visit the Horse Barn, which sells everything from cowboy souvenirs and artwork to western gear.

The ski resort offers skiing, snowboarding, dog-sledding, a "Cat Trax Grooming Tour" and snowmobiling. There's even a track for kids.

Kamloops' Sunmore Ginseng Spa is out of the ordinary. It is a state-of-the-art facility that rivals any first-class spa worldwide. Sunmore not only offers a wide variety of services, but you can also top of your day of pampering with an ancient Chinese tea ceremony. A day at the spa is a perfect treat for mom while dad is fly-fishing with the kids.

Accommodations in Kamloops run the gamut from chain motels such as the Hampton Inn to the historic Plaza Heritage Hotel in the city's downtown core and the beautiful South Thompson Inn and Conference Centre, minutes away from the British Columbia Wildlife Park. The upscale South Thompson Inn sits in the middle of a ranch on the banks of the South Thompson River.

An hour from Kamloops is Sun Peaks Resort. Next to Whistler, it is British Columbia's biggest ski resort. It came into its own in 1993, at the base of what was then known as Tod Mountain. In fact, 1968 Olympic gold and silver medallist Nancy Greene Raine and her husband, Al Raine, left Whistler to open Nancy Greene's Cahilty Lodge, a condo/hotel at Sun Peaks. Now the resort boasts an Italian Tyrolean Village of shops, restaurants and hotels, including the Delta Sun Peaks Resort and the family-owned Pinnacle Resort and Spa.

There are three mountains at Sun Peaks. The terrain over the area's 4,000 acres is varied, offering powder-filled alpine bowls, groomed cruisers and glade skiing. In the winter, families can participate in a number of activities, such as skiing, snowboarding, dog-sledding, the Cat Trax Grooming Tour and snowmobiling. There's even a circular kid's snowmobiling track – with kid-sized vehicles.

In the summer, mountain biking and hiking are but a few of the many activities to keep your family occupied.

Take a trip back in time with an Old West stagecoach.

KOFFLER CENTRE DANCE TROUPE SEEKS SPONSORS FOR ISRAEL TRIP

Toronto's Nirkoda Israeli Folk Dancers have been invited to participate in the Karmiel Festival, Israel's largest and most prestigious folk-dance festival, slated for this July.

Nirkoda is a group of 16 dedicated volunteers who express their love of Jewish culture and heritage through choreographed folk-dance performances offered around the community. The troupe's home is the Koffler Centre of the Arts in the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

"When performing at international folk-dance events, Nirkoda Dancers act as good-will ambassadors on behalf of the Toronto Jewish community," says troupe director Ronit Eizenman, noting that the Karmiel Festival attracts about a quarter of a million attendees.

Nirkoda is seeking sponsors to help cover the cost of the trip. Tax-deductible donations may be made to the Koffler Centre, Nirkoda account. For details, please call 416-636-1880, ext. 352.

Names in the News: "A word clearly spoken is like a pattern of golden apples on a silver mosaic," wrote King Solomon (Proverbs 25:11).

Toronto's David Harduf knows this all too well. He's laboured for more than a decade on a unique project – Harduf's Transliterated English-Hebrew Dictionary (Chiefly Biblical Lexicon), utilizing the Hebrew Bible and the English-language King James Version. The newly available Volume 14, which begins with the word "speeches" and concludes with "squawk," is the latest volume in print.

The Polish-born linguist, who served in the British army during World War II and arrived in Canada about a quarter century ago, told Eye on Arts that he works on the dictionary "from the morning until 12 o'clock at night." About 100 libraries around the world have put in standing orders for each new volume of the dictionary as it emerges from the press.

The list includes major institutions in the United States, Europe, Australia, New Zealand and Israel, as well as the University of Toronto, York University, Ryerson University, the Toronto Reference Library and the Barbara Frum Library in North York.

Harduf estimates another six volumes are needed to complete the dictionary. We wish him a hearty yasher koach as he continues with his monumental task.

Oral history reveals German attitudes to Nazis, wartime atrocities

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

What We Knew: Terror, Mass Murder, and Everyday Life in Nazi Germany* by Eric A. Johnson and Karl-Heinz Reuband, Perseus.

Major questions about the Hitler era in Germany continue to pique the curiosity of historians and sociologists alike.

Why did the Nazis appeal to tens of millions of Germans? What was known, on a grassroots level, about the deportation of Jews and the death camps in Poland? How entrenched was anti-Semitism?

In short, how did the average German relate to these vital issues?

To a significant degree, the answers are found in What We Knew: Terror, Mass Murder, and Everyday Life in Nazi Germany by Eric A. Johnson and Karl-Heinz Reuband, an American and German professor of history and sociology, respectively.

In this enlightening oral history, the authors thrash out the issues through 40 interviews with German Christians and Jews and through analysis.

The oral histories by non-Jews are most revealing because they offer the best clues about the mindset of ordinary Germans during that period.

Johnson and Reuband believe that the popularity of National Socialism was based, in part, on Adolf Hitler's personal magnetism and the cult of personality that formed around him.

Beyond that, Germans were impressed by the economic upswing and the reduction of unemployment and criminality. "The sun was shining for everybody," says Rolf Heberer, one of the interviewees.

Except Jews, of course.

Henry Singer, a Jew from Berlin who fled to Italy in 1938, contrasts the behaviour of Germans with that of Italians who, he recalls, were "very generous... very humane and very hospitable."

Jews, as Leipzig Jew William Benson says, were fully integrated into German society. Nonetheless, state anti-Semitism, as it unfolded during Kristallnacht in 1938, met with popular approval.

Helga Schmidt, a resident of Dresden, says that Jews were presented by the regime as exploiters and that this perception was widely accepted. Yet some Germans, such as a Bavarian stenographer named Anna Rudolf, were disgusted by the persecution of Jews.

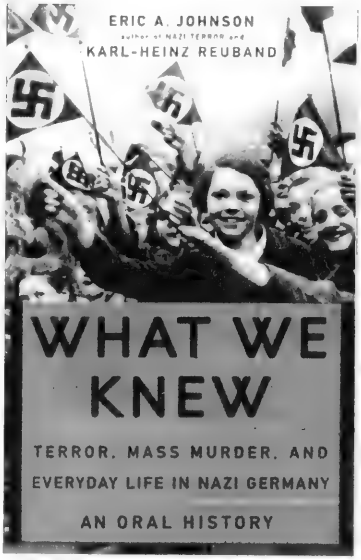
Analyzing the data, Johnson and Reuband conclude that there was a sharp deterioration of relations between Jews and non-Jews after the accession of the Nazis in January 1933.

They report that a large proportion of Jews received considerable help and support from non-Jews, but a greater percentage did not offer their assistance.

Far from being shrouded in secrecy, the deportation of Jews often took place in the full light of day and in full view of civilian onlookers, they add. Hannelore Mahler, a half-Jew from Krefeld, was led past its main Catholic church just as Sunday mass ended.

Ekkehard Falter, who lived in Dresden during the war, says he was aware that Jewish classmates were gradually vanishing from his school. "But the disappearance of the Jews is not something we took note of officially," he observes.

In an important caveat, the authors point out that an awareness of the deportations did not necessarily mean that they would end in mass murder.



Here is their explanation:

"From surveys we conducted, we know that a large number of people in Germany came to know about the Nazi crimes against humanity, such as the Gestapo's use of torture during interrogations and the killing of handicapped and mentally ill persons in the Nazi euthanasia program. But how many Germans came to know about the most egregious Nazi crime of all, the murder of the European Jews?

"Since the number of the physically disabled and mentally ill took place on German soil, it was more likely that news of the killing would spread among the German public. But this cannot be said about the murder of Jews. The conditions surrounding this crime were different. Most significantly, the murder of Jews took place in occupied territory in the east, where the spread of information could be better controlled."

In the early phase of the murder of Jews in Poland and the Soviet Union by Einsatzgruppen units, German soldiers commonly witnessed the wholesale massacres. Given these circumstances, they were a source of hard information about the Final Solution. Still other Germans came into contact with concentration-camp prisoners.

Johnson and Reuband calculate that about one-third of the German population knew in some form or another about the Holocaust.

Information about it was spread widely among Germans from all socio-economic backgrounds and communities.

The interviews shed further light on this core issue.

Gertrud Sombart, the daughter of a policeman from a small town near Dresden, was asked what she knew about the mass murder of Jews and the camps.

She replied, "Not about the mass murder. We heard from my mother, who had heard from a female patient at the hospital, that there were such camps. But we thought they were labour camps..." Sombart, however, learned about the murders from a dedicated Nazi who personally watched the shootings of Jews.

Werner Hassel, a soldier from Upper Silesia stationed in Poland, claims he was ignorant of Nazi atrocities. "The soldiers out there on the front knew effectively nothing about the concentration camps and the mass murder of the Jews," he says. "That was really known by people with inside information. When we were in Poland, we heard absolutely nothing... no rumours, absolutely nothing."

But Adam Grolsch, a radio operator in the German army on the Russian front, witnessed the murder of Jews in Pinsk in October 1942.

His testimony leaves one shaking.

"I set out with a friend, and with my own eyes saw how the people there were slaughtered. In two days, 25,000 men, women and children [were killed], and in the most beastly way. I saw how they had to undress in front of the tank traps... And the absolute worst thing I saw was how this man took a screaming baby and beat it headfirst against a wall until it was dead."

Grolsch remembers that the orders, given by Germans, were carried out by local collaborators, Russians, Lithuanians and Latvians. "They did everything they were ordered to do," he says.

In summing up, Johnson and Reuband write that the reaction of many Germans to the persecution of Jews was basically ambivalent.

Although they responded negatively to Nazi propaganda about Jews, they accepted the new situation and concerned themselves only with their own private lives.

Call it human nature.

Former yeshiva student plays the lead in his own film

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Harlen Wall is a lucky guy, having realized his childhood dream.

He yearned to be a filmmaker and an actor, and now, with the imminent release of The Therapeutic Touch, he has achieved both goals all at once.

The 31-minute film, which Wall conceived, wrote and stars in, deals with such primal issues as abuse, pain, lust, trust and healing.

Scheduled to be screened at the Bloor Cinema on April 26 at a one-night event called The Best of Canada, a showcase for some of Canada's best independent films, Wall's short will be premiered in the United States at the Worldfest in Houston shortly afterward.

"I decided to make The Therapeutic Touch two years ago, when several people I knew died of cancer, including my uncle and my doctor," said Wall, a 32-year-old Torontonian and graduate of Northern Secondary School's drama program. "Their deaths really had an impact on me: life is short and I shouldn't wait any longer to pursue my dream."

But before finally taking the plunge, Wall seriously considered the rabbinate. In this spirit, he accepted a one-year scholarship at Aish HaTorah, a yeshiva in Jerusalem, where he developed a passion for biblical studies.

"I became obsessed with Judaism. Acting seemed incredibly boring compared to matters of the divine," he said.

Continuing his rabbinical studies at an Orthodox yeshiva in upstate New York, Wall was all but certain that he was cut out to be a rabbi.

"I love to teach and communicate, and I believed I could make a difference as a rabbi, but I got overwhelmed and took a break."

As a diversion, he studied at the University of Toronto, majoring in English literature and minoring in philosophy. During this period, his religious observance waned while his focus changed.

Bitten by the acting bug yet again, Wall took acting classes in Toronto, honed his talent as an impersonator and created two characters who appear in The Therapeutic Touch – Vinnie, an angry Italian gangster from Brooklyn, and Leroy, an African-American boxer.

Wall spent a year writing the script for his low-budget, intense two-character film. Last spring, he started assembling a small crew who agreed to work on a deferred payment basis.

"I was fortunate enough to acquire a great crew. Some of the most talented local filmmakers devoted a considerable amount of time to my film. They loved the story and believed in the message."

The Therapeutic Touch turns on a 30-something nebbish, Ira Goldstein (Wall), who visits a comely prostitute named Mary (Heidi Tan) on the eve of embarking on his rabbinical studies.

Instead of having sex with Mary, he plies her with questions about herself, engages in role playing and takes a phone call from his mother.

Ira also confesses that his heart is not in the rabbinate, gives Mary his Star of David chain, thanks her for her attention and empathy, and gently hugs her as his allotted hour expires.

"In terms of the story, I was motivated by a need to express what I consider to be the greatest lesson in life," Wall said. "This is the importance of being able to walk into an unholy situation and make it holy.

"I see this as the quintessential Jewish struggle to embrace humanity and its temptations and yet remain holy and to sanctify God's name in every situation. The burden of responsibility doesn't end when one makes a decision to visit a prostitute. It only begins. I also wanted to show that nobody is above the frailties and weaknesses of human nature."

The setting is not as controversial as some might think, he said.

"The Torah does not shy away from the reality of prostitution. The union of Judah and Tamar is the best example of this. One of the greatest biblical figures employed the services of the prostitute Tamar. And when Joshua went to Jericho, before the conquest of Israel, it was a prostitute who hid him in her house and saved his life along with other Jewish spies."

The Therapeutic Touch is definitely not autobiographical.

"I've never been to a prostitute. However, there are certainly parallels to my life. Ira is torn between his need to become a rabbi and his desire to be an actor. This struggle is one I relate to very closely."

Ira, too, is the product of a broken home, said Wall, whose parents, Jack and Lori Allan, split up.

"When I was young, my twin brother and I found ourselves in the middle of a bitter divorce, and I can relate to the pain of having to choose between parents. It's an awful thing to be put in the middle."

Harlen Wall decided to make his first film, The Therapeutic Touch, two years ago, when several people he knew died of cancer.

Since Wall had limited financial resources, he and his director/producer, Paul Stark, completed the film in only three days. "We shot on digital video, so we were able to keep the cost still further down."

They made the film in a seedy motel at Spadina and College. "Just as we were about to start filming, the police showed up and kicked us out because they assumed we were shooting a porno. I had to start all over again and assemble another crew. It took a long time, but eventually I found the right people to help bring my vision to life."

He learned an important lesson during the shoot.

"There is nothing glamorous about making a film," he explained. "It's one of the most difficult things to do in life. It's like going to war. Making a film is like giving birth. It's so painful. As you're making it you swear you're never going to do it again. Then you look at the end result, and before you know it, you start planning the next one. You decide to go through the whole process again. It's crazy."

Wall's interest in cinema began as a child.

"I always loved movies. My childhood was turbulent, but I could always escape into the magical world of film. I dreamed of being in a movie and used to look in a mirror and impersonate my favourite actors and comedians."

Wall, who earns a livelihood as a Hebrew and Jewish studies tutor, is currently planning his second film, The Salesman's Son, based on a script he wrote several months ago.

"It's a story about the special relationship between a father and a son. It's about resolving the pain of the past."

Production is set to begin soon.

As well, Wall is looking for a publisher for his first novel, Little King Con, which revolves around a young Jewish man whose web of lies and deceit turns into a journey of self-discovery.

Despite his fascination with film, Wall is still thinking of the rabbinate as a career alternative.

As he put it: "I don't want to close the door on being a rabbi. I think it's good to have a back-up plan. The entertainment business can be very superficial, and it's important to keep growing spiritually. One has to be grounded.

"My investment in biblical studies has only helped me as an artist. The Bible is replete with timeless metaphors and powerful stories of human struggle. In a strange twist of irony, my theological training has made me a better actor and writer."

Sonny Goldstein, CFP

Rabbis, imams forge ties in Seville

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The four days of workshops, dialogue and dinner table conversation produced no Middle East consensus. It also included its fair share of tension and the occasional Jewish stereotype and angry diatribe against Israel.

Yet, the only two Canadian Jews to attend the Second World Congress of Imams and Rabbis for Peace last month in Seville, Spain, insisted the event was worth it.

Upon reflection less than a week after their return to Montreal, Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem Synagogue and Rabbi Howard Joseph of the Spanish and Portuguese Congregation were grateful to take part in an event that was so rich in symbolism, and that underscored the common humanity of Muslims and Jews, and the aspirations of 150 religious leaders of both faiths to live in peace.

"If two people need to talk but live far apart, the first thing you have to do is to set up the phone lines," Rabbi Steinmetz said. "Here, we set up the phone lines."

Rabbi Joseph, who also attended the inaugural congress in Brussels more than a year ago with Rabbi Barry Levy of McGill University, was impressed the second event drew more participants, up 50 per cent from the 100 who came last year.

"I think the first few years will involve increasing the number of people, of widening the circle, he said. "There's real achievement there."

The forum drew many top figures from the Jewish and Muslim worlds, including André Azoulay, counsellor to King Mohammed IV of Morocco; Israel's chief Ashkenazi rabbi, Yona Metzger; Ahmed Abbadi, director of Morocco's public affairs department; Reuven Firestone of Hebrew Union College; and former Israeli cabinet minister Rabbi Michael Melchior.

During the March 19 to 22 congress, rabbis Joseph and Steinmetz witnessed both uplifting and disappointing events.

For example, the congress, with close to 300 participants (including academics) from 31 countries – including a large number from Israel – issued a final statement affirming that there is "no inherent conflict" between Islam and Judaism, as well as calling for mutual tolerance and respect for religious symbols, and condemning "any incitement against a faith or people."

It added that "our two religions share the most fundamental value of faith in the One Almighty whose name is Peace, who is merciful, compassionate and just."

As if to underscore that sentiment, the Alcora Hotel, where most of the congress took place, housed a mosque and a synagogue in adjoining rooms where imams, rabbis and others prayed mere metres from one another.

Rabbi Joseph said he saw imams come into the shul to observe Jewish prayer. That, he said, would be virtually unimaginable in most of the participants' countries.

On Monday evening, after a long day of workshops, rabbis, all of whom were Orthodox, joined imams in an impromptu dance session as music played.

As much as it helped build bridges, the forum – sponsored by the Paris-based conflict resolution group Fondation Hommes de Parole, under the patronage of King Mohammed VI of Morocco and King Juan Carlos I of Spain – at times had tension simmering beneath the surface, rabbis Steinmetz and Joseph said.

After an encouraging start on Sunday, they recounted, some of the Palestinian imams – particularly former Hamas member Imad al-Falouji – tried to "hijack" the conference by harshly denouncing Israeli policy.

"Things blew up," Rabbi Steinmetz said.

Rabbi Joseph estimated that perhaps a half-dozen Palestinian imams attended with the agenda of "grandstanding" and using the forum to make accusations against Israel.

But, both he and Rabbi Steinmetz stressed, they comprised a "clear minority" among the imams who attended.

Rabbi Steinmetz said he has already gotten flak, and expects to get more, for having being quoted by Associated Press as saying that "the guys from Gaza needed to be heard."

But he also said he has received "much more support" than criticism for attending the conference.

"Let's face it," he said. "People are open [to such an event] but also quite skeptical. The challenge is to have achievable goals and to sustain a sense of hope without overreaching."

For all the talk that took place, the rabbis said that whatever progress occurred in building bridges was made at the personal level, through exchanges in hotel corridors or around dining tables, and not in any concrete initiatives from the congress.

And despite the underlying tensions that never quite disappeared, the rabbis and imams did gradually warm to each other, they said.

Rabbi Steinmetz, who led one workshop on racism, anti-Semitism and Islamophobia, came away astounded by the many differences in practice and levels of sophistication within Islam.

One imam, he recalled, was "absolutely furious" that any effort would be made to suppress free speech by censoring Danish cartoons of the prophet Muhammad that inflamed so much of the Muslim world earlier this year. The cartoon issue was a topic of fervent debate at the forum and was alluded to in its final statement.

Paradoxically, he said, an imam could show warmth and acceptance toward one of his Jewish counterparts and at the same time believe stereotypes about Jews. But he said that might be because many of the imams had never met a Jew.

Puncturing such stereotypes, Rabbi Steinmetz said, would be virtually impossible without such a forum.

"That is the advantage of dialogue," Rabbi Joseph added.

Marlie starred for Israel at international tournament

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Daniel Erlich is the go-to guy for his hockey team in Toronto, the AAA Bantam Marlies, so it was no surprise he was the player expected to lead the way for Israel's under-18 juniors at a recent International Ice Hockey Federation tournament (IIHF).

Erlich didn't disappoint, as he carried the Israeli juniors to a silver medal in the IIHF's Division III competition in Romania, helping move the Israelis up to Division II next year.

Along the way, the 15-year-old led the tournament in scoring (12 goals, 14 assists in five games), was named team and tournament MVP, and impressed his head coach, Jean Perron, with his skills and attitude. All the while he was matched up against 18-year-olds

"He's quite a good player," Perron said on the phone from Montreal. "For his age, he's probably the best I've seen playing that type of hockey."

Perron, who as head man of the Montreal Canadiens has seen lots of good players, said Erlich "does everything right. He's got a knack for the net, good stickhandling, he's fast, he plays well with his teammates.

"There's nothing I can complain about. He's a complete player."

When The CJN caught up with him, Erlich was on his way to a post-season game. The Marlies were competing in the All-Ontario Bantam AAA Championships, and as the box score would later show, Erlich would register a goal and an assist to help the team to a 6-4 win over Nepean Raiders that night. The win evened the Marlies' record at 1-1-1 at the time. Erlich had two goals and two assists in the Marlies' first three games in the six-game round-robin event.

The styles of hockey in Canada and internationally are quite different, Erlich said. "Here, it's a lot better calibre and the reffing is better. I play a little rough here. It's different. You have to."

At the IIHF event in Romania, "there's not much hitting, so it's more about skill," he continued.

With lots of skating room, the five-foot-six, 140-pound Erlich was able to showcase those skills. Even against the gold-medal Romanians, who were fighting to get back to the Division II after being relegated the year before, he was able at times to make the opposition look foolish.

Daniel Erlich

Perron recalls one particular play – a highlight for Israel in a 13-2 loss. In an unforgettable display of stickhandling skill, Erlich undressed three Romanian forecheckers in his own zone. "He did something against Romania, and they were the best team," Perron said.

"He deked three players in a row. I wish I had that sequence on tape. They went after Daniel, he deked one. He did a spinarama and the three Romanians collided among themselves. I never saw anything like this."

> 'There's nothing I can complain about. He's a complete player'

Erlich remembers eluding the three forecheckers, too. "I deked out three guys and they all hit the boards. It was funny, really funny," he said.

"No question, Daniel was the best player in the tournament," Perron stated. "The exhibition he put on against Romania put him in that class. Nobody could compete one on one with him."

Though he possesses tremendous individual skill and scoring ability, Erlich said he sees himself foremost as a playmaker. "I like to make my teammates look better and set them up," he said.

Erlich and his family immigrated to Canada from Israel when he was an infant. He's been on the ice since he was three and at around seven or eight, he really started to excel at hockey.

He was also a very good soccer player his father, Arie, played professionally for Hapoel Tel Aviv – but decided to devote all his sporting energy to hockey.

He's been playing at the AAA level for eight years. "I just practise a lot," he said. "My dad put me in a lot of hockey schools." Erlich worked hard on his skating and stickhandling, and he does lots of dry-land training in the gym to improve his stamina.

Perron feels if Erlich continues to develop he has a chance at making a major junior team, but Erlich has other ideas. Next year he'll play minor midget hockey for the Marlies and then he'll graduate to the Ontario Hockey Association (OHA) and junior A. From there he hopes to impress U.S. college scouts and earn a scholarship to an American university.

In the meantime, he's enjoying the international hockey experience.

After practising with the Israelis during their stopover in Toronto last year, he was recruited to the team and joined them earlier this season on a North American tour.

"I feel good playing with them," he said. "You play for a country – not a lot of kids can play for a country."

Education may be dividing us

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

New Views

Toronto boasts an expansive Jewish educational system that ranks highly among major North American Jewish communities. We have more than 70 schools and a wide variety of choices for every age group, from kindergarten through high school. There are so many schools that you can choose whatever flavour of Judaism you desire. There are schools for the ultra-Orthodox, modern Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, traditional and post-denominational, to name just a few. You want it, Toronto's got it.

It's a terrific selling point for our community, but Toronto's Jewish education boom has also served to increase many of the serious divisions in our community. We haven't simply grown as a single whole, we've splintered into smaller communities, often based on the minutest of religious details. And the establishment of new schools at such as rapid pace has served to maintain closed borders within the community.

The education system was not always a means to produce exclusivity. Not too long ago, one could find diversity within Jewish schools, as opposed to between them. Twelve years ago, my eighth grade class mixed all kinds of kids: a couple of boys with Mizrachi/Bnei Akiva backgrounds, a bunch with Agudath Israel sensibilities and some who sported long peyot and had no clue what bands were hitting the top of the pop charts. Not so surprisingly, we managed, for the most part, to all get along and find the common interests that connected us. We didn't worry too much about the small details that divided us, and neither did our teachers.

But my Grade 8 melting pot simply could not exist today. The community has grown large enough to spawn entire classes and grades for every type of child – there's no need, so the theory goes, to mix them. Each segment of our community is now in a position to offer its own specific type of education to its own constituents. And that means our city's young Jews are missing the opportunity to meet, learn with and learn about their contemporaries who have even slightly different values than their own. That's a tragedy in the making.

There's no doubt we'll never see a return to the heterogeneous schools of the past. Our growth means we can afford more and more schools that can accommodate the beliefs of every small community along Bathurst Street. Admission policies and educational mandates will only become more detailed as time goes on, and, eventually, we will create schools that churn out cookie-cut children complete with blinders to block out whatever isn't on their school's ever-more-limited curricula.

It's a bleak picture, to be sure, and one that will be hard to prevent. But if children from different parts of the community will never study together on a day-to-day basis, we might at least find ways for them to meet in neutral, pressure-free settings that all schools can be comfortable with. Currently, the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education does not hold a single community-wide event for students that boasts participation from a majority of Toronto's Jewish schools. (According to its website, the BJE organizes approximately five inter-school programs each year, but none, excluding the national Bible Contest, appear to attract a majority of elementary and secondary day schools, and supplementary schools.)

That scary statistic suggests the BJE does not recognize the seriousness of the situation. Why not establish an annual, community-wide science fair, or a track-and-field day, or a picnic in Earl Bales Park? How about an annual early-June trip to a Toronto Blue Jays game for every single student at a Toronto Jewish school? Or maybe a city-wide spelling bee? There are so many possible ways to encourage children to meet and learn with each other in informal, pressure-free environments. The key is to leave the politics – religious and otherwise – out of these events. Let the kids just be kids, even if it's only for one day.

As Jewish Toronto continues to grow, these kinds of community-wide programs may be the only chance we'll get to introduce children to a wide world of Judaism that they won't have the opportunity to experience or learn about in school. It's up to the BJE to ensure that the Jewish youth of Toronto are not moulded into the instruments that make permanent the borders that are already beginning to divide us.

Stuffed Boneless Chicken Breast w/ Apricot Jam

Stuffing: 1 cup boiling water
3 c matzah farfel
1 1/2 med onions, finely chopped
1/2 green pepper, finely chopped
3 ribs celery, finely chopped
1 tblsp oil
3 large eggs, beaten
Salt and freshly ground pepper to taste

Chicken: 6 boneless chicken breasts, halved

Apricot jam

Preheat oven to 350°F. Stuffing: Pour boiling water over farfel; wait until all the water is absorbed. Let cool. Sauté onion, green pepper and celery in oil over medium heat until the onion softens. Combine beaten eggs, sauteed vegetables and soaked farfel in medium bowl; season with salt/pepper to taste. To stuff breasts, spoon 3 tblsp. stuffing on top of each chicken breast. Roll up; use a toothpick to fasten closed. Yield: 8 to12 servings.

The good women of China

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

If you stand in one place long enough the world will come to you

— Chinese Proverb

URBAN WRITER

Volvo has just announced that it will produce its new S40 sedan in China. Wal-Mart is set to build 20 more stores in China this year. Last year, the firm bought $15 billion (US) worth of products from China. About 70 per cent of the commodities sold at Wal-Mart are made in China.

China's economy is growing rapidly and the world is going Asian crazy with the prospect of unimaginable treasures and riches. Yet in all of this excitement, there is a near inaudible whisper about China's human rights record and the depth of the damage caused by the Maoist Revolution.

Recently, I read a book titled The Good Women of China: Hidden Voices (Vintage Canada) by Xinran. Xinran was the first person to host a radio call-in show – Words on the Night Breeze – for women in China. In her book, she tells the story of her own suffering during the Cultural Revolution of the late 1960s, as well as the stories of a number of Chinese women growing up in a destructive, chauvinistic and dangerous country.

In this 240-page book, Xinran writes about the regular abduction of young girls from their families during the 1970s and 80s. Many were gang raped as a "right of passage" into the Revolutionary Guard. Wives and mothers were also stolen from their families an husbands and married off to movement members in distant villages. They often never saw their relatives again.

Xinran writes about one young girl, the daughter of a Chinese military officer, who was repeatedly raped by her father over a series of years. The broken girl ultimately ended up in an institution, inflicting physical harm on herself so she could stay locked up and far away from her father, who was immune from prosecution because of his military status. Xinran writes of how the adolescent befriended a fly in an attempt to love something. Soon enough, the fly died and the girl, unable to bare any more suffering, killed herself. According to the author, stories such as this were common during the Cultural Revolution.

Just as Jews were publicly humiliated during the Holocaust, so too were many Chinese women during the Cultural Revolution. Some were paraded through the streets for the crime of simply adopting a foreign fashion or trait.

"Everyone who has lived through the Cultural Revolution remembers how women who committed the 'crime' of foreign clothes or foreign habits were publicly humiliated," Xinran writes. "Their hair was shorn into all sorts of strange styles for the Red Guards' amusement; their faces were smeared with a mess of lipstick; high-heeled shoes were strung together and looped around their bodies."

China's leadership is responsible for the murder and persecution of millions of its citizens during the Cultural Revolution, as well as for human rights atrocities that are happening today. Recently, a Tiananmen Square veteran, Li Jianping, was indicted for "subverting state power through Internet articles."

Every businessperson who invests in China should read The Good Women of China. Through it they might realize that while economic prosperity could create a better place for the next generation of Chinese, countless men and women living today are suffering terribly from the pain inflicted upon them over the last few decades.

That whisper, the very low-key one, seems to become quieter with every new Wal-Mart store. Judge for yourself. According to a review in the Globe and Mail, The Good Women of China is, "a jeremiad of suffering… and a shock for outsiders to learn of the things that went on in China."

China's deeply wounded call out to us. While you're doing business in China, make sure to respond.

The Haggadah inspires hope for a better life

Editorial

The story of the Exodus from Egypt has been the bedrock foundation of Jewish peoplehood across time and space for more than 150 generations. That is why its re-enactment is the central purpose of our celebration of Pesach. Even as our ancient forebears were being freed from their pharaonic bondage, they were commanded to tell their children about the miracle of their freedom.

The Haggadah is, of course, the narrative instrument that our sages created to forever enshrine that re-enactment in our rituals and traditions. They prescribed an order a seder, in Hebrew – for the requisite components of the festive retelling of the Exodus.

Compiled more than 1,500 years after the event, the Haggadah is the most poignant of all proofs, if proof were ever needed, of the profound, all-encompassing, empathy, love, concern and respect that our ancient rabbis had for their people, Israel.

Layered and interwoven delicately into one seamless instructional book, the Haggadah is, among other things, a history text, an educational guide, a prayerbook, a songbook, a psychologist's interpretative key and an aid to good parenting.

But, above all else, the Haggadah takes its place in our hearts and on the barricades of Jewish history as a book of everlasting hope.

Freedom from Pharaoh's slavery is meant to tell us that the lives of human beings count above all else. Freedom from all forms of slavery is meant to teach us that the highest calling in the service of mankind is the betterment of the human condition.

The hope of a better life, of a better world, is the first step to its realization.

The retelling of the Exodus begins, not with the actual first details of the story, but rather with the loud and very emphatic proclamation expressing concern for the well-being of "all who are hungry and all who are needy." To be without food or a place to celebrate is an affront to human dignity.

If we cannot reaffirm the fundamental importance of human dignity on the night of Pesach, the first night of our freedom, then what have we learned from the holiday in years past? And what is the purpose of our celebration?

The News in Brief

Canada

Aliyah Record Set

TORONTO — A record number of Canadians – 376 – made aliyah in 2005, up from 312 in 2004 and 229 in 2003, the Israel Aliyah Office for Toronto and Western Canada said last week. Of the 2005 olim, 65 per cent were Orthodox, 15 per cent Conservative and 15 per cent Reform or secular. As well, half were single, and nearly 50 per cent were 18 to 34. The Office expects a new record of close to 450 olim in 2006.

Cleric Condemns Hate

OTTAWA — The Catholic archbishop of Ottawa wants Catholics to "turn in love" to people who have experienced anti-Semitism and other religious and racial prejudice, the Canadian Catholic News service reported. Archbishop Marcel Gervais made the comments in his annual Easter message. He was responding to B'nai Brith Canada's recent audit that reported a threefold rise in anti-Semitic incidents since 1981, and the recent kidnapping and murder of Ilan Halimi in France. "In Canada, we already have laws that prohibit any discrimination against any racial, ethnic or religious groups. But the rise in anti-Semitism reminds us that our society has a long way to go before we can claim a truly just society," he said. He also said the Second Vatican Council document Nostra Aetate condemns anti-Semitism.

Israel Trips Offered

TORONTO — Toronto Jews from 18 to 26 years old are being invited to apply for 80 spots on two Jerusalem Fellowships trips to Israel, May 14 to June 4 and June 12 to July 3, being organized by Aish HaTorah. For details or to apply online, visit worldwide jewishadventures.com.

World

Editor Defends Piece

LONDON — The editor who published a controversial article on the pro-Israel lobby in the United States defended her decision to publish the piece. The London Review of Books' Mary-Kay Wilmers, who is Jewish, told the London Observer March 31 that "when I reread the piece, I did not see anything that I felt should not have been said." The report was written by John Mearsheimer, a political science professor at the University of Chicago, and Stephen Walt, an international affairs professor at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government. It accuses pro-Israel groups of skewing U.S. policy, and suggests that Israel's supporters pushed the United States into the Iraq war. Harvard has distanced itself from the article, which has been widely criticized for being anti-Semitic and unscholarly.

Return Art, Panel Says

VIENNA — An Austrian panel recommended that thousands of Nazi-era looted artworks be returned to their original owners. The panel recommended last week that 6,292 works be returned. Austria's state-run museums took over many of the works before, during or after World War II.

Anti-Semitism Down

NEW YORK — The number of anti-Semitic incidents in the United States decreased slightly in 2005, a new report says. The Anti-Defamation League's audit, which looked at anti-Semitic activity across the United States, recorded 1,757 such incidents last year, down slightly from the 1,821 incidents in 2004, which constituted the highest level of anti-Semitic activity in nine years.

Charges Denied

PARIS — The chief suspect in the brutal murder of a French Jew denied to an investigative judge that he committed the crime. Youssouf Fofana admitted he was the leader of a gang suspected in the case, but he gave no explanation for Ilan Halimi's death, his lawyer said. Fofana is accused of leading the gang that allegedly kidnapped and tortured Halimi, 23, who died of his wounds.

Hezbollah Sign-Off

WASHINGTON — Two European satellite firms, one French and one Spanish, removed the Hezbollah radio station al-Nour last week. The move will affect South America, Europe and Asia, the Coalition Against Terrorist Media said. The move follows the U.S. Treasury Department's recent designation of Hezbollah's al-Manar TV station, al-Nour radio and the parent firm of both, the Lebanese Media Group, as specially designated global terrorist entities.

Camp Name Change?

WARSAW — Poland has asked UNESCO to change the name of the Auschwitz death camp. Authorities asked UNESCO to change its name from "Auschwitz Concentration Camp" to the "Former Nazi German Concentration Camp Auschwitz-Birkenau." They say it will remind people that Auschwitz's horrors were committed by German Nazis, not Poles. Tomasz Kuncewicz, head of the Jewish Education Center, Oswiecim, told JTA that Auschwitz is sometimes "referred to as a Polish death camp, and this is very upsetting to many Poles." He added that some Poles don't know the camp was run by Germans.

Birthright Haggadahs

NEW YORK — The birthright israel program is distributing 100,000 free Passover Haggadahs to alumni and supporters. Thousands more will be able to access the Haggadah through the group's website www.birthrightisrael.com.

Former Native Leader Appeals Hate Ruling

SASKATOON — Former national native leader David Ahenakew last week appealed a 2005 ruling that said he willfully promoted hatred against Jews.

Doug Christie, his lawyer, said the decision was the first step toward a "tattletale police state," because Ahenakew, now 72, made the comments in what he thought was a private conversation.

Ahenakew was fined $1,000 and stripped of the Order of Canada for 2002 comments to a reporter at a native health conference in which he called the Jewish people a "disease" and asserted that Hitler was justified when he "fried six million of those guys." Just before the comments, he made a speech in which he blamed Jews for starting World War II. The judge said he will rule on the appeal in a month or two.

Ottawa urged to act against suicide bombing

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Wiesenthal Centre releases report on digital terrorism and hate

The Canadian government is being asked to use its influence at the G8 meetings in Russia this summer to make suicide bombing a crime against humanity.

Foreign Affairs Minister Peter MacKay was asked to consider the step as part of Canada's role in the war on terror, said Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center.

Rabbi Cooper met with MacKay and other lawmakers last week as part of a Canadian visit during which he released Digital Terrorism & Hate 2006, a CD that contains updated information about the use of the Internet by terrorists and hatemongers. Rabbi Cooper also met with Justice Minister Vic Toews and Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day.

Rabbi Cooper said the G8 meeting is expected to be contentious, "but suicide bombing can't wait. If there's a joint resolution on this, [it will mark] an important step forward.

"People around the world would like to see Canada be Canada, not Switzerland. We'd like them to roll up their sleeves and get back in it and take a leadership role," he added.

Part of his discussion with Day included the Wiesenthal Center's findings on Internet terror and an offer to further brief the minister and his department on the issue.

Rabbi Cooper said the Internet is increasingly being used as a virtual "university of terrorism" in which detailed and accurate information is traded on "making a dirty bomb, poison gas, instructions to target churches and synagogues."

One web document contained instructions on making dirty bombs, chemical weapons, rocket propelled grenades and suicide vests.

"Most of it is in Arabic," Rabbi Cooper said.

Neo-Nazi and skinhead groups, which were the focus of the annual Digital Hate CDs when they were first released eight years ago, "use overseas Internet sites to evade anti-hate laws and attract thousands for illegal hate music concerts. Hooligan sports groups seek recruits for racist manifestations at football matches," the centre said in a news release.

Rabbi Cooper said hatemongers continue to be a problem, but the real "existential threat" lies with terrorists.

Wiesenthal Center researchers uncovered "how-to videos" setting out in minute detail the preparation of suicide devices. One video posted on the web followed a suicide bombing team. It showed them preparing, departing for their target and then detonating the device. When the explosive went off, the people holding the video camera can be heard "actually cheering and saying Allah Akbar [God is great]," Rabbi Cooper said.

Another video shows a civilian helicopter being shot down in Iraq. The Bulgarian pilot survived and after being calmed down and told to walk away, he was riddled with bullets.

For Iraqi insurgents, capturing the attacks on video and making them available on the web is a way of recruiting new terrorists, Rabbi Cooper said.

These kind of "snuff videos" are popular in the Middle East, he added.

Rabbi Cooper said terror groups are constantly shifting between the web, chat rooms, bulletin boards and e-mail.

"Terrorists are on the cutting edge of technology," he added. "They try to harness the new technology and make it more difficult to be tracked by the big boys – police and intelligence agencies."

Wiesenthal Centre researchers uncovered a terrorist website that publicized a confidential alert between law enforcement agencies about explosives that had disappeared. The information was turned over to U.S. authorities.

Rabbi Cooper shrugged when asked whether that indicated terrorists had hacked into law enforcement websites. "This report shows us that every cutting edge development is being manipulated, absorbed and brilliantly used by terrorists. We've reached a new level."

Moses our teacher

The irony of the coincidence could not have been more poignant. Last Sunday, on the eve of Passover, as it were, Thomas Axeworthy, a prominent Canadian political scientist, the former principal secretary to Pierre Trudeau from 1981 to '84, wrote a column that appeared in the Toronto Star whose headline asked: What qualities do we want in a leader?

Quoting Richard Neustadt, his colleague at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard University, Axeworthy stated that there were "four essential questions that Canadians should consider as they assess the men and women who seek to be prime minister."

The four Neustadt questions were, in somewhat paraphrased form:

- why does the person want the job?
- what is the person's "feel" for governing?
- what is the person's "power to persuade?" and
- "what sustains a leader against the frustrations and temptations of power?"

Interestingly, sadly, of the four criteria proffered by Neustadt and Axeworthy, only the first and last touch upon the issues of character and deep values of the individual – and these only indirectly.

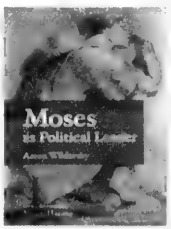
As elaborated upon by Axeworthy in his article, the Neustadt criteria are overwhelmingly pragmatic in their scope and application. Only by implication do they suggest that we ask: who is this person and what does he or she stand for?

The celebration of Passover – the holiday that established the beginning of the Jewish people's national freedom and political independence – provides a wonderful opportunity for us to look within our own tradition to reflect upon the question posed by Axeworthy.

The Haggadah is silent on the subject of Moses and his involvement in the Exodus from Egypt. For important theological, nation-building and historic reasons, our ancient sages preferred to omit reference to Moses when they compiled the text of the Haggadah. God's all-powerful outstretched hand steered the events that unfolded some 4,000 years ago in Goshen and beyond.

But outside the pages of the Haggadah and even within its lines, the figure of Moses looms large. The late, renowned biblical scholar Nahum Sarna referred to Moses as "this towering personality, pre-eminent in the entire cast of biblical characters." Moses was our teacher, indeed the teacher of all teachers, and the leader of the people for some 40 years during their difficult, formative, transitional desert wanderings.

Despite the centrality of his place in the formation of the Jewish people, the biblical narrative provides few details about Moses' life before his appointment by God. The midrash fills in some of those details. The bible focuses upon his mission and the way he fulfilled it.



Through the ages, many scholars have speculated and written about the character, nature and life of Moses, the human being. For even without a full biographical portrait of the man in the Bible, there are a great many aspects of his life from which we can learn.

In 1984, one of America's most singularly recognized political scientists, the late Aaron Wildavsky, wrote Moses as Political Leader. It was a breakthrough study that examined the story of Exodus from a politico-academic point of view and the role of Moses as a political leader moulding a vulnerable rabble of freed slaves into a God-fearing, law-abiding nation of free men and women.

Wildavsky was particularly qualified for his task. He was a professor of political science and public policy at the University of California, Berkeley. Among the many titles he held was president of the American Political Science Association and a fellow of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences. He was the author of 39 books on all aspects of government. Wildavsky passed away in 1993 at the age of 63.

Some two decades after Moses as Political Leader first appeared, Shalem Press (Jerusalem and New York) has rereleased it with an accompanying foreword by Yoram Hazony. One of the reasons, Hazony writes, for rereleasing Wildavsky's remarkable book is to "place the Hebrew Bible within the overall history of political thought in the West."

We owe Shalem Press a great debt. Wildavsky's insights and observations are powerful. Merely one example will suffice.

"Only when Moses accepts the human need to wrestle with history can he begin to free his people from the moral and mental fetters of slavery. The Egypt of those days was a specific place. But the slavery it symbolizes is a permanent condition, from which men continually struggle to liberate themselves. It is not physical miracles for which Moses deserves praise… but rather the miracle of moral rebirth, through which mankind occasionally can overcome the slavery of its self-absorption."

Moses as Political Leader is an inspiring book. Tom Axeworthy should read it.

Ambassador pleased with evolving ties with Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's early yet in the lives of the new governments in Canada and Israel, but Israel's ambassador, Alan Baker, is pleased about the evolving state of the relationship between the two countries.

On the issue of Canada's voting record at the United Nations, on its views of the Palestinian Hamas government, on fighting terrorism and on bilateral trade, Baker sees relations between the two countries moving closer together.

Alan Baker

"We're very enthusiastic that the government [in Ottawa] is realizing where Canada's true interests should be in the Middle East," Baker said in a telephone interview from Ottawa.

Israel and Canada, he noted, "are liberal democracies based on the rule of law, countries of immigration, bilingual and both are eager to combat terrorism and to ensure true democracy."

In the short time since the Conservatives assumed power in Ottawa, Baker has met Prime Minister Stephen Harper and International Trade Minister David Emerson and he hopes to meet with Foreign Minister Peter MacKay and Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day.

He characterized his meeting with the prime minister as a "friendly" one in which the two discussed a number of issues, including the new Hamas government, Hezbollah, "the threat of Iran," and bilateral trade.

He said Harper was keen to encourage commerce between the two countries.

On the Hamas file, Baker said that "it was only natural" Canada would decline to fund the terrorist government elected by Palestinians.

Canada joined other western nations in saying there would be no financial support for Hamas unless it agreed to give up terrorism, accept agreements negotiated by the previous Palestinian government and recognize Israel.

"We welcomed it… it was certainly an important message to convey to Hamas," Baker stated. "We think Canada got off to a good start on this."

At the same time, Baker voiced concern there might be an attempt to rehabilitate the Islamic terrorist movement and paint it as a reasonable peace partner for Israel.

He pointed to a recent Globe and Mail article that focused on the contemporary appearance of a senior Hamas official – his modern mustache, his sports jacket – and which repeated the official's query as to what Hamas did do deserve its international opprobrium.

Hamas, Baker said, "has not moved one iota from its character as a terrorist organization."

It will take "a revolutionary development for Hamas to become a mainstream political party," he said.

"In my previous incarnation as legal adviser to the Foreign Ministry of Israel and as a researcher on international terrorism, I was able to look into the character and ideology of Hamas as a terrorist organization," Baker distinguished between the Fatah-led Palestinian national government, which was also a terrorist entity but "could adapt pragmatically and change." That allowed it to negotiate arrangements with Israel and although they violated their agreements, talks were possible.

However, "Hamas can't even make that commitment. The way they interpret the Qur'an, any change in their character would render them no longer Hamas."

As a result of the Palestinians' decision to elect Hamas, Baker said there appears no hope for a peace process with the Palestinians. Without a peace partner, Israel will have to act on its own to implement its strategic and tactical interests, he said.

Turning to local issues, Baker said he hopes to foster a "strong relationship between the Jewish community and the embassy."

Canada urged to push for changes to UNRWA

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canada has a unique opportunity to take the lead in pushing the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian refugees (UNRWA) to exclude Palestinian terrorists from its payroll and to adopt the same criteria on refugees that the UN uses elsewhere, an Israeli researcher said last week.

David Bedein told a small workshop at the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation that Canada has leverage as chair of the Refugee Working Group, an independent multilateral assembly that supplements bilateral discussions on Palestinian refugees. Canada can push for the application of the principles used by the United Nations Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) to the Palestinian situation, he said.

Since its creation in December 1949, UNRWA has had jurisdiction over Palestinian refugees, while UNHCR has a mandate to address the humanitarian needs of all other refugees around the world. UNRWA has departed from the principles of resettlement and normalization that UNHCR applies universally in all other refugee situations, said Bedein, founder of the Israel Resource News Agency.

Instead of "resettl[ing] refugees with dignity," UNRWA predicates its operations on a "right of return" for Palestinians to homes they once possessed in what is today Israel. Bedein argued that "right of return" does not exist as a principle in international law and that by advocating it for Palestinians, UNRWA has kept them in "a situation of limbo" since 1949.

As a result, UNRWA is guilty of "the ultimate crime of manipulating people's human dignity," he stated.

Bedein said UNRWA's staff includes many members of Hamas, the radical Islamic terrorist organization that recently formed the Palestinian Authority government. Canada, which has announced it will not fund the Hamas government, co-ordinates the 38 donor countries who provide funds for the UNRWA payroll, gives UNRWA $11 million and makes sure it remains solvent, Bedein stated.

In addition to UNWRA's employing numerous Hamas operatives, schools it administers in refugee camps use textbooks that fuel the conflict with Israel. They ignore the historic Jewish connection to the land and maps in the textbooks don't include Israel at all, he said.

Bedein said the concept of the right of return has been integrated into the "UNRWA curriculum" and is part of the pervasive atmosphere in the camps. UNRWA camps have celebrated Martyrs' Day, which honours suicide killers.

Bedein said donors providing funds to UNRWA should demand accountability of how those funds are used in UN schools.

Bedein's address was sponsored by the Media Action Group and the Canadian Coalition for Democracies.

John Fairley, Samuel Kleinberg and Lorne Spivak

As many of you know, I announced my retirement several months ago. The reason? I couldn't find anyone, with whom I was comfortable with, to take over the business.

And then an old friend and business associate, Lorne Spivak, came to me with a perfect plan.

Lorne and his partner, John Fairley, would assume the business and continue to provide my customers with the same merchandise quality and pricing policies.

I want to assure you that not only will I still be available, but everything you've come to expect at Samuel Kleinberg Jewellers will remain the same.

Hope to see you soon.

Baker welcomed graciously

In his two years on the job, he has crossed the nation, visiting large centres of Jewish life as well as smaller communities in Regina, Sydney and Victoria.

"To me, it's very important to enable the Jewish community to have access to the Israeli ambassador and get briefed...and [allow them] to make their views known."

He has been welcomed graciously and his diplomatic colleagues representing other states are envious when he tells them how warmly he has been received.

While the Jewish community often sees eye to eye with the embassy on important issues, he acknowledged there can be areas when that is not the case. Asked to comment on the question of UNRWA, the United Nations Relief and Works Agency, which is responsible for providing humanitarian aid to Palestinian refugees, Baker said Israel has had a sometimes rocky relationship with the agency. Some past UNRWA leaders were hostile to Israel, and when Israeli Defence Forces entered the Jenin refugee camp in 2002, soldiers saw UNRWA schools full of posters glorifying suicide bombers.

But "at the moment," he said, "we're going through one of the better periods of co-operation."

Israel is committed through long-standing international agreements to permit the functioning of UNRWA in Palestinian refugee camps. He said Canadian citizens have a different interest in UNRWA.

"Canada is being asked to finance this organization and pay substantial portions of its budget," he said. "Canadians have the right to be interested in how it's spent, so I don't think one thing should be connected with the other.

"It's your tax money going to UNRWA and so the Canadian community has an interest [in UNRWA] from another perspective."

Turning to the diplomatic community in Ottawa, Baker said relations are good, though he has faced "hostility from the former Saudi Arabian ambassador," who was at turns "rude and hostile" to him in a variety of social situations.

Baker has no contact with the ambassadors from Syria and Lebanon; however, he is good friends with the Jordanian and Egyptian ambassadors and he maintains good ties with the his Turkish and Moroccan counterparts.

Looking ahead, Baker said he hopes to build on the evolving relationship with Ottawa and to invite the prime minister or his senior ministers to visit the region.

He has plans to rejuvenate the moribund Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce and promote trade between the two countries.

When he was first assigned to Ottawa, he admits "I thought it might be slow and boring. It's not."

Right now, he said, he's too busy to be bored.

Israel's El Al registers record profit in 2005

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Last year was a pretty good year for El Al in Canada and around the world, though 2006 is shaping up as a more difficult year for the Canadian branch of the Israeli national carrier.

Last year, the Israeli airline recorded its biggest net profit ever – $64.1 million (US) – and the carrier's Canadian route flew at 94 per cent capacity, compared to 84 per cent the year before.

This year promises to be more difficult, said Stanley Morais, general manager of the airline's Canadian office. "The situation is not as rosy as we'd like it to be," he acknowledged. Bookings are down 18 per cent in 2006 from the same period the year before and the airline will offer only eight weekly flights during the busy summer season, which begins June 25, compared to nine in 2005.

In an interview at his downtown Toronto office, Morais attributed the decline in bookings this year to a particularly large volume in 2005 due to pent-up demand. Passenger traffic to Israel began a steep decline in 2001, coinciding with the Palestinian intifadah, though it rebounded in 2005 as well as the year before.

As a result of the re-emergence of Israel as a popular travel destination, El Al recorded its more successful year ever in its 56-year history. Last year's profit marked a 94 per cent jump over earnings the year before.

"The increase in profits is a direct result of many steps taken to improve efficiency and in reducing operating expenses despite a steep surge in fuel costs," El Al said in a statement.

The airline's profitability coincides with the privatization of the carrier. Control of the airline moved in late 2004 from the State of Israel to Knafaim-Arkia Holdings, which in turn led to changes in company management and structure.

Morais said that while the airline industry as a whole has suffered since 9/11, El Al was in even worse shape because of the added impact of the intifadah.

"For a small airline like us to show a profit shows privatization works," he said. "When the government was involved, it was hard to make it work. You see the positive results."

In addition to cutting staff from a high of 5,000 (at the start of the intifadah) to 3,500 today, El Al made improvements in on-board service and comfort in order to appeal to the traveller. Food quality was improved and more convenient arrival and departure times were implemented, Morais said.

"In 2005, El Al made a huge investment in Toronto," investing $3.8 million (US) to upgrade the business class in the Boeing 767s that fly the Toronto-Tel Aviv route. The cabin was made larger, more room was placed between rows and the seats now recline farther than before, Morais said.

"As a direct result, we've seen a dramatic increases in the number of business class passengers," he said.

El Al, which has been flying between Canada and Israel for 35 years, also improved its on board services by adding satellite phone service at a fee of $1.60 a minute.

The Toronto-Los Angeles route has proven quite profitable for El Al, Morais continued. Once the airline acquired the right to fly passengers between the two cities, it began selling between 50 and 60 tickets per flight, adding $2 million to the airline's revenues.

Morais noted that while the airline's business has bounced back in recent years, it's still centred in the Toronto market. Something like 80 per cent of its traffic originates locally, while 15 per cent comes from Montreal, and a further five per cent can be attributed to the rest of Canada.

Within those numbers, "the Jewish market is the bread and butter of… this airline," he added.

El Al is in discussions with WestJet "to find new solutions" for passengers flying to Israel from Western Canada. The goal is to make the airline more attractive to Christian groups from the West who are travelling to the Holy Land, while WestJet and El Al are discussing increasing the Canadian airline's profile in Israel to make it an option for Israeli travellers to western Canada, he added.

Responding to suggestions that El Al's fares are too high – a critique voiced recently by representatives of the Israeli Tourism Ministry – Morais said, "everybody would like everything cheaper, but at the end of the day, somebody has to pay the bills."

He said airlines experience large variable costs – such as fuel and, in Toronto, de-icing, which can add $30,000 to the cost of a flight – something people in other industries don't appreciate.

He suggested some of the sniping at El Al might be because of institutional jealousy at the airline's newfound profitability. He acknowledged there is tension between Israel's Ministry of Tourism and El Al, adding, "It's because people in the ministry don't understand the airline business."

Morais said he remains optimistic about the future, "but we're aware it is very sensitive to the [security] situation in Israel and we don't know from day to day how it will turn out."

Hope and promise of a better world

Our concern for the dignity of our fellow man is so ingrained, especially at this time of year, that for centuries, it has been customary for individuals and the community to collect funds for kimcha d'pischa (flour for the making of matzah on Pesach) or for ma'ot chittin (money for the buying of wheat) to distribute to the needy and indigent.

The photo on page 1 of today's CJN is a plain-truth, emotional example of taking action on behalf of the other's dignity. It shows the distribution in Jerusalem last week of provisions for the seder to needy survivors of the Holocaust. Provisions worth hundreds of thousands of dollars were distributed to as many in need as possible in Jerusalem and throughout Israel.

But there are many hungry and many in need. A survey conducted last week disclosed that one-third of all Israelis will find it financially difficult to get through the Pesach holiday and that 10 per cent of the general population will not be able to hold a seder meal at all.

In every community around the world where Jews assemble to celebrate Pesach, countless volunteers have gathered to collect and distribute food and other provisions to people in need.

Performing acts of kindness, friendship and charity is part of the instructional inheritance left to us by our ancient sages. They understood, from the often difficult conditions under which our people lived, that kindness and caring, like the golden lines on an early morning horizon, brought hope to the hearts of the weary or oppressed.

That is why they infused the Haggadah with signals and signs of hope.

For example, opening the door for Elijah to sip from the ceremonial cup was not simply an invocation by the wise rabbis for Divine justice.

It was far more. And every Jew who ever lived in conditions of fear or want, knew it.

For it is Elijah, our traditions and folklore tell us, who will usher in a sense of unity within our people, who will "reconcile parents with their children and children with their parents." It is Elijah, we are told, who will one day announce the coming of the messianic age.

In every generation, at every table of every seder, we have welcomed Elijah. In their profound wisdom and undifferentiated love for all their people, our beloved ancient rabbis chose the most perfect, even if somewhat enigmatic, way of holding out the hope and the promise of a better world.

We thank God for bringing us to this day. Chag Samayach.

Passover 5766

The democratic struggle for human dignity is the spirit of Passover.

The idea that liberty must prevail in every generation and be enjoyed by each individual is an integral part of our daily prayers. Every person, in every generation, must picture himself as having been freed from Egypt. This identification with the Jewish struggle for freedom has given the Jewish people the determination to carry on.

Indeed, the springtime festival of Passover acts as a harbinger of new life and hope for women and men who have suffered the bitter cold of exile and oppression. Even as we celebrate around the festive seder table, we remember our long, stormy history.

Throughout centuries of adversity, the Passover festival has given Jews newfound strength and hope. It unites today's generation with its ancestors from the days of Moses, the Maccabees, the Spanish Inquisition, the cruel blood libels of the Middle Ages, the barbaric pogroms, the unspeakable crimes of Nazi Germany, the heroic uprising of the Warsaw Ghetto, and the Arab nations' repeated efforts to crush the reborn Jewish state.

Yet we have triumphed over our suffering and degradations, and witnessed the birth of our beloved State of Israel. We learned from our history and gained the faith and confidence to carry on our struggle against our present enemies in order to reach our ultimate victory.

Around the seder table, the Haggadah reminds us of our heritage, and reaffirms our faith in God's concern for Israel and humanity, and in the hope that justice and freedom for all women and men will prevail.

Today, Passover's legacy sustains the Jewish people in their struggle against terrorism and the rising threat of a new global anti-Semitism.

Israeli women denied divorces

In modern 21st century Israel, a democratic country, or so it would like to think of itself, women are still not equal to men. Hundreds of women are waiting for divorces and are prevented by religious law from receiving one. Their husbands, long separated from them, have not yet found other women whom they wish to marry or who are willing to marry them – and so they refuse to divorce their wives. Without a divorce, these women cannot ever marry again. This vindictive behaviour on the part of the husbands often continues for many years.

Judaism is an ancient tree with strong roots. Fierce cold winds, hot dry weather and sudden environmental changes will split those heavy, overloaded branches that then break off; those lifeless branches that bear neither fruit nor even leaves will wither and hang there uselessly until they drop off onto the ground. The tree's roots, however, are healthy, and new, young and vigorous branches will appear from time to time.

True, in the last half century, there has been minor alterations in the status of Jewish women. But how long must women be punished for having been born Jewish? No wonder Jewish men thank God for never having been born women.

The ulpan at Hebrew U

Jean Gerber will be happy to know that the summer ulpan at Hebrew University is an amazing place to meet members of many diverse cultures ("Budget cuts threaten our special ulpan," CJN, March 30). My family went one summer, all four of us in different levels.

To give you an idea of the people we met: in my class, we had Jewish people from Germany, parts of Russia, France, Canada and the United States, from yeshiva boys to people who had never celebrated Shabbat. We also had two Japanese girls in the class. Both my mother and sister became close friends with Palestinians in their classes. My father had the most interesting classmate – a Pentecostal man from Louisville, Ky., with a thick southern accent who claimed he was there because one day, speaking in tongues in a religious trance, he magically spoke and wrote a bit of Hebrew. He now wanted to learn the language properly.

While it would be a pity if Gerber's ulpan closes, she should rest assured that Hebrew University will continue to provide a safe location for contact between all kinds of interesting people.

Why isn't Moses in the Haggadah?

By REUVEN HAMMER
Jerusalem Post

Moses Presenting The Ten Commandments, engraving by Gustave Doré (1832-1883)

The Pesach Haggadah is a fascinating work, an accumulation of prayers, readings, songs and stories that has one aim: to fulfil the Torah's command: "And you shall tell your child on that day, 'It is because of what the Lord did for me when I left Egypt.'" (Exodus 13:8)

But as a matter of fact, the story itself is told in only the most cursory fashion. The sages found the briefest account of the story, in Deuteronomy 26:5-8, and placed it as the centrepiece of the evening, together with ancient rabbinic comments to those verses. The details, the "story" as such, are completely ignored. Of course, there is nothing to prevent us from discussing the details. As a matter of fact, we are told that "the more you tell the story, the more meritorious it is." Yet I have a suspicion that the reason they included only that brief account is because what is told there is what they considered important.

What is in those verses? We went down to Egypt. We multiplied and became a nation. We were oppressed. God saw our distress and rescued us. In their eyes, that is all you know and all you need to know. That is also the message of Rabban Gamliel's teaching that three things must be expounded at the seder to fulfil the obligation of "telling": Pesach, matzah, maror. To the sages, Pesach represented God's protection of Israel; the matzah, God's redemption of Israel; the maror, the enslavement.

The details, the exact story who did what when were not important. God's plan for Israel is what matters. God's saving power, which is a promise for the future as well as a story of the past, is what our children must learn. I often think about that when I read the debates among archeologists as to whether or not the Exodus ever took place, or if all the details as related in the Torah are completely accurate. Could there really have been 600,000 males wandering through the desert for 40 years? Where is the Sea of Reeds and how could such a parting of the waters have taken place?

When the radicals among them tell us it never happened because we have found no archeological evidence, my first reaction is that you cannot learn anything from the fact that something has not been found. My second is to say: do you really think the Israelites would have made up such a story from whole cloth? What was to be gained from saying you had been enslaved if you were not? My third is to say that the details are of no consequence. We were enslaved, we were freed from slavery and we believe that it was the Divine will that accomplished it. That is quite sufficient for me.

One of the interesting details that is ignored in the Haggadah is the existence of a man called Moses who served as God's messenger in bringing about the Exodus. I am not aware of any specific injunction against mentioning him, but it hardly seems credible to think that the omission of Moses from the Haggadah is a mere accident or an oversight. We can only speculate as to the reason, but I believe that there are two reasons: one internal, the other external, one positive, the other negative.

The internal, positive reason is that the sages wanted us to focus on the role of God in our freedom. Israelite monotheism is very strict in focusing all power on the one God. It may have allowed for the existence of other non-human beings – angels or what you will – but they were not invested with independent power. Thus the sages emphasized that it was God and not any other being, human or divine, who brought about Israel's salvation.

The external, negative reason may have been a reaction to the rise of Christianity and the calamity of the Bar Kochba rebellion. The core of the Haggadah was created in the early days of Christianity and is found in the Mishnah, which was edited in 200 CE after the defeat of Bar Kochba, the most terrible calamity for our people until the Shoah. Christianity was concerned with redemption. So is the Haggadah. For Christianity, redemption is from sin and death; for Judaism, it is from foreign oppression. Christianity also had its interpretation of the Pesach in which the meal becomes the sacrament, the wine the blood of Jesus, the matzah Jesus' body and Jesus himself the Pesach lamb.

For Judaism, it was therefore important to stress that no one other than God Himself was responsible for redemption. This emphasis on God came at the expense of Moses. Furthermore, the tragedies brought about by belief in human beings as redeemers – first Jesus and then Bar Kochba caused the sages to play down the role of any messianic figure in Jewish history. They therefore do not say anything disparaging about Moses – how could they? But in the ritual retelling of the story they ignore him and concentrate solely on God. "Not by an angel, not by a seraph, not by a messenger. I and no other!" That lesson should not be ignored.

Stop whining and start moving

I have nothing against complaints. Complaints are society's quality-control mechanism, targeting ineffective things for improvement. More importantly, righteous protest is the first step on the road to freedom.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

From the Exodus to the U.S. civil rights movement, outcries against injustice are a call to responsibility.

Yet, many of today's protests are simply old-fashioned whining, with paranoia and self-pity masquerading as calls for justice. A few insensitive cartoons in an obscure Danish newspaper, and suddenly you have a worldwide cause célèbre. A public figure makes an errant remark, and suddenly he faces accusations of anti-Semitism, sexism or racism. These complaints are more about making noise than pursuing justice.

Whining is a form of self-pity, and a way to shift blame to someone else so that we're no longer responsible or in control. And it's natural. We all like to indulge in self-pitying fantasies of helplessness.

So how do you break out of a whining spell? Do you need to read books or attend workshops? Actually it's very simple. You just have to move on. When the Jews were being chased at the Red Sea, they cried out to God, paralyzed by uncertainty. God's answer, via Moses, was simple: "Why are you crying out to me? Tell the Israelites to move on." God's advice, phrased in a less formal way, is to "stop whining and start moving"

God tells the beleaguered Jews at the Red Sea to move on, because no one should ever believe they're helpless. The moment we start whining, we must find ways to take action – any action – to change our circumstances. Even in the bleakest moments, a person can choose his destiny

I draw inspiration from people who made the best of awful situations, like Rami Harpaz, an Israeli pilot who, along with nine other Israelis, was an Egyptian prisoner of war for three years. During their time as PoWs, they conducted classes for each other and worked on plans for their lives once they were freed

One day, a parcel arrived with a copy of J.R.R. Tolkien's Lord of the Rings, and they immediately started to work on translating it. Together, the 10 men completed a translation that is now one of two standard ones in Hebrew of Tolkien. They may have been prisoners, but they refused to give up.

Harpaz put it best in a recent interview: "Falling into captivity presents you with a number of choices. You can either pity yourself and wallow in misery, or do something to organize your time as constructively as conditions allow."

His advice is useful to anyone, no matter what their situation: when you're feeling sorry for yourself, stop whining and start moving.

We must show steely resolve against Islamism

In March, after Israel invaded a Palestinian prison in Jericho to apprehend the murderers of an Israeli cabinet minister, Palestinian "militants" went on a kidnapping spree. The targets, naturally, were westerners who help Palestinians. One Canadian social worker, Adam Budzanowski, said on video: "I was advised straight away that this action is not taken against me personally or against any other detainees."

Gil Troy in Montreal

Budzanowski's gentlemanly understanding might be understandable, considering the filming occurred at gunpoint. But the reaction of an American victim, Douglas Johnson is incomprehensible. After being freed, Johnson said of his kidnappers, "They are angry over what is going on in Jericho. I feel sympathy with them." News reports reinforced this seemingly logical reaction by noting that angry Palestinians accused Britain and the United States of complicity in Israel's siege of the prison.

Putting aside Palestinians' self-destructive targeting of Western do-gooders who are sympathetic to their cause, why is the West so complacent about such racism? Rejecting attempts to punish members of an entire group for the perceived crimes of particular individuals was one of the 20th century's greatest moral achievements. Americans learned to recoil when Southern whites lynched a group of blacks, claiming that one black man had dishonoured a white woman. South Africans learned to question the assumption that if one person of colour happened to be ignorant or violent, all were. Germans learned about the evils of deeming one group "diseased" and deserving of eradication.

Yet the Islamist war against the West has returned such evil bigotry to the mainstream of world discourse. Intellectual idiots such as Johnson validate such thinking, while supposedly objective reporters make such twisted thinking seem logical by writing stories in a linear fashion. That so many mainstream media outlets deemed the Danish cartoons of Muhammad "offensive" – when most were benign – seemingly rationalized the racist attacks on Danes, Europeans, and westerners in general. A dozen cartoonists sketched the controversial drawings, yet hundreds of millions were targeted – even as most cowering Western media outlets suppressed the cartoons.

Such bigotry is a defining characteristic of the new, ugly Islamism seeking world domination and advocating mass murder. While U.S. President George W. Bush carefully salutes Islam as "a religion of peace" and only targets Islamofascists, the Islamofascists target westerners promiscuously, aggressively and shamelessly.

The Hamas charter declares war on all Jews. Osama Bin Laden's fatwas target "Jews and Crusaders" – Islamist shorthand for all Christians. Iran's president singles out Israel and the United States, while his mullahs and their fundamentalist colleagues worldwide vilify all westerners. Bruce Bawer's terrifying new book, While Europe Slept, shows, in the words of its subtitle, "How Radical Islam is Destroying the West from Within" by exploiting European naivete.

While westerners rationalize each violent outburst – explaining away Palestinian suicide bombings by blaming Israel, 9/11 by blaming America, the fall riots in Paris by blaming the French, the cartoon jihad by blaming the Danes – the Islamists pursue an integrated strategy of world war. While westerners dither about a response, the Islamists snicker and move forward. Hamas fanatics must laugh when suckers like former U.S. president Jimmy Carter hail their "pragmatism."

Recently, Iran's former leading nuclear negotiator, Hassan Rowhani, admitted that while western diplomats chatted in Tehran, the Iranians installed critical nuclear bomb-making equipment at the Isfahan nuclear facility. "From the outset, the Americans kept telling the Europeans, 'The Iranians are lying and deceiving you and they have not told you everything.' The Europeans used to respond, 'We trust them,'" Rowhani boasted in a speech to a closed meeting of leading Islamic clerics and academic.

"We trust them" reflects some of the western mind's most noble impulses: the commitment to rationality, the instinctive empathy for others, and the assumption that we are all fundamentally similar. But "We trust them" must not become the West's epitaph. Too many lovely westerners "trusted" Hitler for years until the Anschluss. Too many idealistic westerners "trusted" the Communists for decades, even after the Stalinist purges. Likewise, too many naïve Westerners seem to trust the Islamists today.

We need to see this hateful ideology for what it is. We need to work together to encourage moderate Muslims to stop the bigots while showing that the West is united, resolute, powerful, and ready to fight terrorism and repudiate Islamism. We must stop finding excuses for an integrated, hate-mongering, pathological ideology that threatens good people throughout the world.

What's on my seder table

Over the years, a number of items have made their appearance on my seder table. Not part of the traditional array of Passover symbols, these items come in addition to the ones I recall from the seders of my grandparents, long ago. Like the contents of my grandparents' seder plate, they carry symbolic meaning that is elaborated as part of the maggid, or storytelling, of our seder, complete with supplementary readings.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Some of these latter-day additions to the seder table have come and gone, while others have become a permanent part of our Pesach celebration. These respective readings have been tucked into the pages of our Haggadah, nesting there and yellowing from one year to the next. Among the items that have graced our seder table are a fourth (and some years a fifth) matzah, an orange wedge and a cup of water.

The fourth matzah first appeared at our seder many years ago, at a time when Russian Jews could not openly practise Judaism, speak Hebrew or affirm a connection with Israel. As we read about the movement of our ancestors from slavery to freedom, we also read from letters written by Russian dissidents. The fourth matzah called us to engage in the struggle of our contemporary brethren imprisoned in gulags or constrained by a regime hostile to all things Jewish

In later years, a wedge of orange jockeyed for position on the seder table. Inspired by an urban legend that circulated among Jewish women, the orange was a response to a man who (in the most popular version of the story) declared, in response to the suggestion of increased women's participation in synagogue ritual, "A woman has no more place on the bimah than an orange has on a seder plate!" Alongside readings in the Haggadah of our forefathers and our sages, we told stories that recalled the redemptive courage of the midwives in Egypt, who rescued Jewish infants from a genocidal decree, and other stories about the valour and wisdom of women such as Deborah, Bruria, Rachel, and countless women whose names were forgotten.

In recent years, our seder table has included a kos shel Miryam, a cup of Miriam, filled with water and placed alongside the kos shel Eliyahu, Elijah's cup, filled with wine. After we sing about Eliyahu Hanavi, the prophet Elijah, who will usher in the messianic age, we sing – to the same melody – of Miryam Haneviah, the prophetess Miriam, who shall lead us to the waters of salvation (mei hayeshua).

In Jewish legend, Elijah often appears incognito as a pauper or beggar, testing a host's hospitality and generosity. Linked with the redemptiveness of the Messiah, Elijah also appears at moments of crisis. At the seder, he is most closely associated with the prayer that entreats God to pour out His wrath on our enemies. In Jewish tradition, Miriam is linked with a well that bears her name. Created on the second day of creation, Miriam's Well sustained and nurtured the Israelites through their desert wanderings, because of the merit of Miriam. Side by side, the cup of water and the cup of wine remind us of the force and nurturance inherent in God's presence, and they call us to the redemptive work of tikkun olam, repairing the world.

This year, I plan to make space on my seder table to remember the victims of genocide and slavery in Darfur, Sudan. The journey from slavery to freedom that the seder recollects grounds us in a remembered experience by which we may calibrate our moral compass. Repeatedly, the Torah reminds us that we were once slaves, strangers in a strange land, and enjoins us to use that collective memory as a source of compassion and ethics. There is much in Jewish memory, both ancient and recent, that should cause us to feel a particular empathy with those suffering now in Darfur.

Because they, like our ancestors, are a desert people, I shall again set an extra matzah, and place it near Miriam's redemptive waters. I shall pray that their crisis ends speedily, with the same haste in which our ancestors baked the first remembered matzah. And I shall read from Primo Levi's poem, Shema, which cautions those "who live safe/ in your warm houses/... who find, returning in the evening,/ Hot food and friendly faces," not to ignore the atrocities suffered by others.

The Kirshner File

Gaza settlers are angry and depressed

Two thousand disoriented Israelis wait for better days in a hastily erected camp off a busy highway connecting Ashdod with Ashkelon.

For the past eight months, since Israel's unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip, they have lived in Nizzan, a bleak encampment carved out from the lush fields of Nizzanim, a kibbutz near the Mediterranean Sea captured and destroyed by Egypt during the 1948 War of Independence.

Sheldon Kirshner in Israel

The Jews of Nizzan, the overwhelming majority of whom are Orthodox, represent the largest concentration of former Gaza settlers repatriated to Israel.

Five hundred of the 1,700 Gaza families are in Nizzan, which was partially developed by the Jewish National Fund. As a community, Nizzan consists of identical 90-square metre, tan-coloured four bedroom cottages that resembles a raw North American suburban subdivision.

The other settler families have been scattered by the wind to Yad Binjamin, south of Ashkelon; to a scruffy tent city adjacent to Yad Mordechai, a kibbutz near Gaza; and to rented quarters throughout the country and in the West Bank.

David Bonfad

David Bonfad, a 56-year-old settler from Neve Dekalim, seems typical of the evacuees in Nizzan. Born in the development town of Sederot, he was a kibbutznik in Sde Eliyahu before settling in Gaza in 1985 with his family. "I was looking for a community, a good life," he said.

An observant Jew who sports a knitted yarmulke favoured by Israeli religious nationalists, Bonfad was also attracted to Gaza by a messianic belief in the Greater Israel philosophy. "My whole life has been ideological," he explained. "I thought I would spend the rest of my days in Gaza. It was clear."

Though he waxes nostalgic about Gaza, populated by some 1.3 Palestinians, Neve Dekalim left deep psychic scars on him. His beloved teenaged daughter, Shimreet, was murdered there by Palestinian terrorists.

Bonfad said adieu to Neve Dekalim prior to the Aug. 15 deadline imposed by the Israeli government. Today, he can hardly believe that he will never set foot in Gaza again.

"I did not think God would let it happen," he mused. "Lots of things are unpredictable. We don't understand what God will do."

A sad, ethereal man who still grieves for his late daughter and has created a shrine in her honour, Bonfad regards his departure from Gaza as an expulsion and the government's decision as a betrayal.

At Neve Dekalim, where one-third of the residents were engaged in agriculture, he ran the local post office and supplemented his income as a handyman and plumber. In Nizzan, he is in charge of organizing recreational activities for the settlers, most of whom are unemployed, angry and depressed about their fate.

"I'm back to square one," said Bonfad, who has received only a portion of a government compensation package to which he is entitled. "I have to build a house and find a job. We were once normal people, but now we're under psychological care. I have trouble concentrating, and I can't sleep at night."

Bonfad's second daughter, 15, who was born and raised in Gaza, has been emotionally scarred by the disengagement. "She was assured by many rabbis that the withdrawal would never happen. Now she and other young people are confused."

He rents a cottage for $450 (US) a month. Water and electricity are extra. As if invidiously comparing his home in Gaza with his current dwelling in Nizzan, he said, "It's too hot in summer and too cold in winter, as well as poorly insulated. When you close the front door, the whole house shakes."

Bonfad expects permanent housing in Nizzan to be ready within a year and a half. In the interval, he wallows in sorrow. "It's hard for me to believe that I can ever replicate my life in Gaza here."

Like Bonfad, Arik Harpaz, 50, is something of a refugee in his own land.

A secular Jew from Elei Sinai, in the northern tip of Gaza, Harpaz lives in a tent opposite a gas station and gift shop owned by Yad Mordechai, a kibbutz besieged by Egypt in 1948 but recaptured by the Israeli army shortly afterward.

To him, Elei Sinai was like a dream come true, at least until his 19-year-old daughter, Liron, and her boyfriend, Assaf Yitzhaki, 21, were gunned down in cold blood by Palestinians on Oct. 2, 2001, a year after the eruption of the second intifadah.

Recalling his halcyon days in Gaza, he said, "Doors were unlocked. Children frolicked on the streets."

But after his daughter's untimely death, Harpaz and his family never ceased mourning. "We were broken, though we got a lot of support from our friends. This was very important. We were not alone."

Of the 90 families from Elei Sinai, 30 live in Yad Mordechai's flyblown tent city, which has its own communal kitchen and dining room. The remainder of the settlers are found in neighbouring kibbutzim and in Ashkelon, pining for the moment when they move to new quarters in Palmachim, a kibbutz near Rishon Le Zion, in the heart of Israel.

"We are in the process of negotiations," said Harpaz, "but nothing is ready as yet. The bureaucracy is killing us."

He has received not a penny in compensation so far, perhaps because he and about half of the settlers in Elei Sinai refused to heed repeated warnings to leave before the mid-August deadline. "We decided that money was not everything. We wanted to show the government that we were not afraid."

The army evacuated them on Aug. 21. "There was no violence. We didn't touch the soldiers. We had one last Sabbath meal with them before we walked out peacefully to the border. One of the soldiers cried as we left."

Elei Sinai was established in 1982, amid pristine sand dunes and marvellous views of the Mediterranean Sea. The first six families were from Yamit, a model settlement Israel gave up as part of its 1979 peace treaty with Egypt. Virtually everyone in Elei Sinai, including Harpaz, an expert in hydraulic systems, commuted to jobs in Israel.

A former resident of Ashkelon, he arrived in Elei Sinai in 1990. "I simply wanted to give my three daughters a nice place to live. We fell in love with the scenery. It had nothing to do with ideology."

He added, "I never dreamed I would leave, since, in terms of distance, we were so close to Israel. I was shocked when [Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon announced his disengagement plan. Sharon broke his promise and went the other way. I would have been prepared to leave my house for real peace, but not for this," he said in a reference to Hamas' victory in the recent Palestinian Authority legislative election and Islamic Jihad's continuing Qassam rocket attacks against Israeli border towns and kibbutzim since Israel's pullout. "The Palestinians have won through terror."

Meanwhile, Harpaz lives from day to day in the unsightly tent city. "It's not too nice in this place. We have no privacy."

Harpaz's fellow setttler, Keren Ratzabi, an observant 30-year-old English teacher from Gush Katif, is bitter, too. She and her unemployed husband currently live in an army barrack in Ashkelon, but hope that they and their four children will soon move into a house near Kiryat Gat, north of Be'er Sheva.

Born in Rehovot, she worked in Dimona and Mizpe Ramon before landing in Gush Katif two years ago.

"We went to Gaza for faith and ideology," she declared, passion oozing out of every pore. "We belonged in Gaza, which was ours from the beginning. We came to claim ownership. Great Jewish communities existed in Gaza. We came back, and it was ours. I knew it was the right thing to do. This area was ours. Gaza is ours. We'll be back. Nothing will stop us, but it will take time. You need to have faith. The nation of Israel is not aware of this, of our right to this land. What was promised to us as a nation should belong to us. The government really encouraged us to go to Gaza. Suddenly, it's a mistake?"

The withdrawal has ruined the lives of countless settlers, said Ratzabi, who does not qualify for compensation payments. "People became sick. There were divorces. Families fell apart. People are paying a high price for having done the right thing. It's very hard."

Not surprisingly, she has mixed feelings about Sharon, the architect of the Gaza disengagement. "I feel sorry for him," she said, referring to the stroke that incapacitated him on Jan. 4. "But he hurt his brothers. I can't feel angry, but I pity him."

Poland has become one of Israel's best friends: journalist

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Poland has been one of Israel's best friends in Europe since its peaceful transition from communism to democracy in the late 1980s, says the former editor of a leading Polish Jewish journal.

"Poland has not joined the stampede of Israel-bashing countries," said Konstanty Gebert, a 52-year-old Polish-Jewish journalist who was here last week to address the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation at the University of Toronto.

In an interview, Gebert, the publisher and former editor of Midrasz, a journal dealing with Polish-Jewish relations, said that Poland, a staunch U.S. ally, is more politically supportive of Israel than most European nations.

"The new, democratic Poland has a moral obligation to make up for Poland's dreadful record toward Israel during the Communist era," observed Gebert, who writes a column on world affairs for Gazeta Wyborcza, the largest daily in Poland, with a circulation of about half a million.

Poland, in line with the former Soviet Union, severed diplomatic ties with Israel in 1967 during the Six Day War and displayed hostility toward the Jewish state for many years afterward, said Gebert, whose father was Poland's ambassador to Turkey from 1960 to 1967.

But in 1990, Poland became the second country in Soviet-dominated eastern Europe to re-establish formal relations with Israel. Czechoslovakia, as it was then known, was the first such country to do so.

Since the 1990s, Poland and Israel have formed an intricate web of political, commercial, cultural and military links, and Poland's relationship with Israel today is as good as Germany's relations with the Jewish state.

In terms of its policy on Israel, Poland – which supports a two-state solution of the Arab-Israeli conflict and maintains cordial links with the Palestinian Authority and Arab states – is somewhere between the European Union and the United States, said Gebert, currently a visiting professor at Grinnell College in Iowa, where he teaches a course on Polish-Jewish relations.

On the economic front, Israeli investors have poured $2 billion (US) into Poland, with interests in shipping, real estate, high tech and major department stores.

Polish investments in Israel remain insubstantial, but there is a Polish cultural centre in Tel Aviv, a Polish church in Jaffa and a Polish hostel in Jerusalem.

Military and security ties have grown. "The Israeli military attache in Warsaw is extremely busy," said Gebert, adding that Polish officers have had a respectful attitude toward the Israeli armed forces since the Six Day War.

Cultural ties, running the gamut from book readings to film screenings, are flourishing, he said, and the Roman Catholic church has a generally positive outlook toward Israel.

But irritants muddle Poland's relations with Israel.

"Poland, unfortunately, has not done much to combat anti-Semitism, despite its official condemnation of anti-Semitism," said Gebert.

He cited the case of a Poznan city councillor who once remarked that a dead Jew is a good Jew. When he claimed that he was joking, the prosecutor dropped charges against him.

To date, only one Polish anti-Semite has been indicted for racial incitement. "Anti-Semitism of this kind essentially remains unpunished."

Anti-Semitism is also widely tolerated by the public. "Generally, Poles are not offended by anti-Semitism, but surveys indicate that up to two-thirds of Poles reject anti-Semitism."

There is still a belief that Jews played an immense role in imposing Communism on Poland, a claim that has been mentioned more than once by Poland's primate, Cardinal Jozef Glemp.

Nevertheless, the hierarchy of the Catholic church is less anti-Semitic than it was 15 years ago, said Gebert, whose parents grew disillusioned with Communism after Poland's anti-Zionist campaign, launched in 1967. Still, what he described as "the biggest anti-Semitic bookshop" in Warsaw is found in the basement of a prominent church.

Some church leaders, notably Poznan's cardinal, are positively disposed toward Jews, but they are "marginal voices" in Poland.

According to Gebert, anti-Semitism is a "pressing concern," but not an actual threat to Jews. In the final analysis, Polish anti-Semitism is no more serious than French anti-Semitism, he said.

Postwar restitution is another problem roiling Poland's relations with Israel, but it is expected to be resolved within the foreseeable future.

On a communal basis, Poland has compensated the Jewish community for property seized by the Nazis and the Communists. But legislation for individual property losses has yet to be enacted, making Poland virtually unique in Europe.

Two factors account for the fact that Poland has resisted such legislation, Gebert said. Poland fears that 3.5 million ethnic German expellees will also raise claims, and anti-Semitic Poles oppose individual compensation to Jews.

In Gebert's view, the Polish government will eventually make these payments, but in the best-case scenario, Jewish claimants will receive only a symbolic proportion of their property.

Gebert said that 8,000 "card-carrying" Jews live in Poland today, with an additional 16,000 marginally involved in the Jewish community. In his estimation, there are thousands of Poles of Jewish origin who have chosen not to disclose their identity.

The intermarriage rate has reached the 50 per cent mark, and Jews are well assimilated into Polish society. Citing an example, Gebert said that Poland's current foreign minister, Stefan Meller, is of Jewish origin, as was his predecessor.

Demographically, the Jewish community "teeters on the brink," but two Jewish day schools in Poland, both subsidized by the Lauder Foundation, work at perpetuating Judaism and Jewish culture.

Some young Jews want to rebuild their lives abroad, including Israel, and Gebert said he doesn't know whether even his own children will remain in Poland.

Archbishop says Anglicans aren't divesting from Israel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Despite reports the Church of England voted last year to divest from Israel, the head of the Anglican church's Canadian arm said those stories were untrue, and he repeated earlier reassurances that his church is not considering such a proposal.

Archbishop Andrew Hutchison, the 12th primate of the Anglican Church of Canada, addressed almost 400 people as the keynote speaker at the 20th annual Neighbourhood Interfaith Dinner, held April 5 at Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

Last fall, it was reported that a statement issued in Jerusalem by the worldwide Anglican Peace and Justice Network (APJN) about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict had urged the Anglican Church to follow the American Presbyterian Church's lead to vote to divest from Israel.

In a letter earlier this year to Canadian Jewish Congress, Archbishop Hutchison said that the AJPN document was not urging divestment and that his church will not consider the issue for the time being. He added that the APJN statement doesn't reflect the views of the Canadian church.

At last week's dinner, Archbishop Hutchison explained that the Anglican bishop in Jerusalem, Riah Abu El-Assal, a Palestinian, had called on his sister churches in the Anglican Communion to disinvest from Caterpillar Inc., the maker of equipment the Israel Defence Forces uses to bulldoze houses of suspected terrorists in the territories.

He said the divestment call came before the synod (a council of church officials) of the Church of England, and the resolution it adopted called on the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem and the Middle East "to heed the call... to disinvest from companies profiting from the illegal occupation, such as Caterpillar Inc., until they change their policies."

Archbishop Hutchison said the resolution was meant as a call for further study of the issue, and "is a long way from either a decision to disinvest from Caterpillar, or from the State of Israel."

He also stressed it was not meant as an attack on Judaism or Jewish people.

"We have always maintained the freedom to criticize government policies we perceive to be unjust... But we must be clear in saying that criticism of a policy or action of the State of Israel is not a criticism of Judaism or the Jewish people," he said.

He acknowledged, however, that "given the legacy of Christian anti-Semitism," church officials need to be more mindful of how their statements might be interpreted.

Archbishop Hutchison also said during his talk that he wanted to send a message of respect, appreciation and tolerance to the leaders and members from 11 churches and synagogues in Toronto who were in attendance.

Archbishop Hutchison, a recipient of the Jerusalem Prize and the Alan Rose Award for his leadership in interfaith dialogue, said it's unclear what impact members of the religious community can have in international politics, but he added that "it is here at the local level that our faith communities have the best opportunity to meet one another in ways that promote the deep shalom that is the divine hope for us all."

He described the friendships he has made over the years with members of the Jewish community, such as Victor Goldbloom, chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress' national executive, and philanthropist Charles Bronfman, before ending his address on an inspiring note.

"As people of faith, we must do all in our power to find a common voice to speak to the powers of this world in the name of the Holy One who calls us to justice and peace."

He added that if it's true that there is only one God, "then what we do here can only draw us closer to the one truth that binds us together in the divine love and give us courage to be witness to that love in the world."

Darfur Relief Fund established

Funds raised through UJA Federation will support activities of Israeli relief organization

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

Since 2003, a Sudanese government-backed militia known as Janjaweed has been engaging in a systematic program of murder, terror, sexual abuse, and expulsion in the Darfur region of Sudan. To escape the ethnically charged violence, some 200,000 Sudanese refugees have fled, seeking shelter in Chad.

The refugees must cope with their physical displacement and the trauma from their ordeal at the same time.

To assist them, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has created the Darfur Relief Fund - the latest in a series of humanitarian UJA Federation initiatives.

"UJA Federation like other Canadians, has a strong sense of commitment to social justice and providing relief to victims in the international arena," said David Engel, chair, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "For us, as Jews, to turn our backs on the horrendous acts being perpetrated in Darfur would be inexcusable."

A team of relief workers from IsraAid and HIAS are currently assisting victims of violence in Darfur, Sudan

The money raised by the Fund will support the activities of IsraAID: The Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid, an Israeli relief organization which travels around the world. IsraAid - along with the Hebrew Immigration Aid Service (HIAS), the oldest international immigration refugee resettlement agency in the U.S. - have teams of relief workers on the border of Chad and Sudan providing aid and counseling to the victims, teaching them the skills needed to survive and function in the aftermath of extreme violence.

Working with local staff, the Israelis are identifying the most vulnerable refugees including victims of rape, separated children, single mothers, the elderly, the handicapped and trauma victims to ensure they access basic services.

The group is also working to provide psychological services and to establish activities for children that will help them adjust to living in the refugee camps and dealing with the trauma they survived.

For many, the psychological counseling sessions were quite emotional, leaving some members of the group crying, provoking others to share their experiences.

At the end of one session, one refugee said, "This session is a turning point in my life. I'm so lonely in the camp having lost my father, mother, two sisters and brothers in the war. I cry a lot and see their images at night. During the day, when I stay alone, I find myself in conversation with them. Listening to others talk I realize that I'm not alone and I think we need to continue coming together to share what we think and feel as we are like a family that shares the same pain."

Most girls found it difficult to share their painful experiences because many were sexually attacked. One told the group that it was better to keep quiet than to talk of the things that happened. "When I don't talk about what I saw and experienced, I forget." The group was educated on negative and positive coping skills. They were taught that trying to forget things was one negative mechanism that humans use to mask pain, but that did not mean they dealt with the problem.

The organized Jewish communities in Canada and the United States have been at the forefront of galvanizing public attention to the Darfur tragedy.

On April 30, thousands, including representatives of UJA Federation, will join the "Save Darfur: Rally to Stop Genocide" at the National Mall in Washington, D.C.

To make a donation to the Darfur Relief Fund, visit www.ujadonations.com/darfur or phone the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto hotline at 416.631-5705.

Toronto part of world wide Yad Vashem project

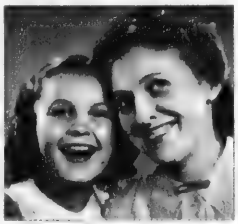
By DANIEL HOROWTIZ
UJA Federation

When one speaks of the horrors of the Holocaust, we know all too well that six million innocent Jewish men, women and children were brutally murdered at the hands of the Nazis.

We know the number, but what about the people themselves? Where did they live? What were their dreams? In short, who were these people?

Over the past 50 years, Israel's Yad Vashem has been working to recover the names of the six million, half of whom are memorialized in its Central Database of Shoah Victims' Names, which contains over three million names, photographs, and biographical details of Jewish victims. But many of those who perished are still missing from this important database.

In response to a worldwide, 11th-hour appeal from Yad Vashem to add as many missing names as possible to its database, Jewish Information Service of Greater Toronto (JIST) - a component of the UJA Federation Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge & Heritage - along with its partnering agencies - is reaching out to survivors, their families, and others, to fill out Pages of Testimony and submit them to Yad Vashem.



This photograph and a Page of Testimony of Holocaust victims Margherita Rubinfeld and her daughter, Helga, were submitted to Yad Vashem by Margherita's brother.

Together with the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, JIST is offering free weekly clinics to those who need help completing the forms. The clinics will be held at the Betel Centre starting on April 26 and running every two weeks to the end of June from 9 a.m. to 11 a.m. Trained volunteers will help people complete the Pages of Testimony and show them the database and its features.

"It's a race against time," says Barbara Barak, senior coordinator, JIST. "Holocaust survivors may not be able to share their memories later on. It's important that we gather the names of as many of the victims as possible in order to honour, memorialize and preserve their legacies," says Barak.

The Pages of Testimony section of the website includes specific information on the Jews who perished in the Shoah. Each Page records the victim's full name, date and place of birth, place of residence before the war, profession, parents' and spouses' names, the circumstances of death, even the name of the person who submitted the information, as well as a photograph of the victim when available.

For details about the dates and times of the clinics or for more information about the forms and the database, members of the community can call JIST at 416-635-5600 or e-mail jinfo@ujafed.org. To access the Yad Vashem database, go to www.yadvashem.org.

Walk With Israel 2006 an event for the entire community

Expert hired to make Walk accessible to participants with special needs

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

Don't be surprised if you see a lot of new faces at this year's UJA Federation Walk With Israel. Walk organizers and UJA Federation's Inclusion Committee have been working hard to ensure that the event, which will be held on Sunday, May 28, will be more accessible to individuals with special needs.

"We want to ensure that every person can come out and participate this year, so we have gone to great efforts to try to accommodate everybody's needs," says Nelly Zagdanksi who is co-chairing this year's Walk With Israel along with Felicia Posluns and Sara Zagdanski.

"What we're trying to do is visibly make a move forward in terms of creating an inclusive event," says Stan Kugelmass, chair of UJA Federation's Inclusion Committee. "The biggest challenge will be getting the word out that this is an opportunity for people who otherwise would not participate in an event like this to come out."

Organizers are implementing a number of strategies in order to make the Walk accessible to the entire Jewish community.

Laurie Sue Robertson, an inclusion expert, has been hired to train the Walk volunteers and staff on the needs of people with disabilities. She will also be wheeling the route ahead of time to identify barriers. The staff and volunteers will then be able to ensure that solutions are found for the problem areas on the day of the Walk.

In order to assist the hearing impaired, a sign language interpreter will be at the Walk starting point at Coronation Park, across from the CNE Princes' Gates, which will feature opening speeches and entertainment.

A shuttle bus will be available in order to provide an option for individuals unable to walk the entire 7.7 km route because of physical limitations.

UJA Federation is also working with Reena and other agencies that serve people with special needs in order to communicate these changes and to identify volunteer opportunities for their clients.

This year's Walk With Israel has adopted many measures so that participants with special needs will be able to comfortably join walkers like these without special needs

While these measures are intended to enable more people to participate in the Walk With Israel, says Kugelmass, they are also important in order to communicate to the community that UJA Federation is serious about making important events inclusive. "The whole community means everyone," adds Kugelmass. "How do you get people out there who can't walk or talk or hear or see? That's what this is all about."

(l-r) Felicia Posluns, Nelly and Sara Zagdanski are back this year as chairs of the UJA Federation Walk With Israel, which takes place on Sunday, May 28.

Walk organizers hope that, in the future, inclusion will become second nature. "Change is slow; this is a starting point," says Robin Gofine, vice president, UJA Federation's strategic planning and engagement. "We hope to build upon these efforts over time."

"It's not easy to do," says Kugelmass. "But it will be worthwhile if even one person comes out who otherwise wouldn't participate in an event like this."

The UJA Federation Walk With Israel will begin at 10:30 a.m. rain or shine, and will hold its registration kick-off party beginning at 9:30 a.m. at Coronation Park, and will include live entertainment, inflatables, face painting and more. The Walk, which begins at the corner of Strachan and Lakeshore (Coronation Park), will wind its way through the streets of Toronto, ending at Ontario Place where the RioCan Carnival will provide walkers with a great kosher barbeque, prize draws, arts and crafts, the Office SuperCentre treasure hunt and much more. During the Walk, participants will be entertained by DJs from five different companies: Corey Mandell, Superior Sound, Mint Events, Magen Boys Entertainment and Sole Power.

For more information about this year's Walk With Israel, or to acquire sponsors on-line, call the Walk hotline at 416.631.5700 or visit www.ujawalkwithisrael.com.

Hamas a pariah entity, says Israel's ambassador to Canada

By electing Hamas in the recent Palestinian election, "the Palestinian public doesn't yet realize what they've done."

That's the opinion of Alan Baker, Israel's ambassador to Canada, who expressed his comments during a recent address to a group of UJA Federation donors.

"I'm not sure whether they expected that voting for Hamas would bring about a situation where they're rapidly becoming a pariah entity," said Baker. The good news about Hamas' electoral victory, according to the ambassador, is that "now we know exactly who we're dealing with, and the world knows who we're dealing with."

Baker also spoke on a wide range of topics, including the Canadian media, the outcome of the recent Israeli elections, and the Iranian threat.

Baker was pleased to be the first ambassador to receive a formal introductory meeting with Prime Minister Stephen Harper, and says that Harper was reassuring regarding Canada's support for Israel.

Alan Baker

His biggest concern regarding Canada-Israel relations is the under-utilized free trade agreement. Baker told the group to anticipate the revival of the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce. "There is good business to be done. There are huge profits to be made."

While Baker believes that there is a chasm between the reality in Israel and how it is portrayed by the Canadian media, he says that the tone of the CBC has changed recently. "I don't know if it's because of the change in government, a change in the area, or possibly it's because of the new ambassador—he's a bit of a nudnik."

Baker noted that this is an interesting time, as the Canadian, Palestinian, and Israeli elections are all bringing about change in the Middle East. "At the present juncture, we're at a change in direction from all angles," he said.

Baker discussed likely scenarios for a Kadima-led coalition in the Israeli Knesset, saying that he believed there would be a solid, stable coalition.

Toronto Jewry sends condolences to family of Ilan Halimi z"l

Over the past three weeks, more than 2,000 members of Toronto's Jewish community signed an electronic condolence book offered on UJA Federation's website, www.jewishtoronto.com for the family of Ilan Halimi z"l. The 23-year-old was found tortured and murdered on February 13 near a railroad track in the Parisian suburbs. The personal thoughts and prayers sent by community members have been sent to Ruth Halimi, Ilan's mother, in France.

Don't want to be a slave to your seder?

Try a more interactive approach

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Most of us attend one of two seders: the "Uncle Murray" model, with a single leader, or the "read around the table" type, where everybody takes turns.

Neither is entirely satisfying, said Baruch Sienna of Kolel: The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Education at a recent workshop titled "Don't be a slave to your seder" that aimed to help Jews bring meaningful, hands-on spirituality to their seders.

In the Uncle Murray seder, "one person really knows what they're doing… and everyone else is passive," Sienna said.

In the second type, which seems preferable, we may end up reading passages we hate, with Hebrew we can't pronounce, or with verses we don't understand – in either language.

"That doesn't work much better," he added.

Sienna, a longtime Kolel instructor who teaches the centre's "Doing Jewish" course, prefers a third approach: the "conductor" model.

A symphony conductor doesn't play an instrument, he noted, but orchestrates musicians in pre-assigned parts.

Assigning roles requires advance preparation, Sienna said, but it allows participants to express their creativity and beliefs by building a diorama to depict "their" section, or by creating a play – with or without puppets – or by leading a Ladino song.

"Seder is the original dinner theatre," he joked.

There's a tension, however, between the carefully scripted Haggadah and the evening's personal, improvisational nature. Though the word seder means "order," the Haggadah and "Maggid," its largest section, both come from the root word "to tell," which is a more spontaneous process.

"It's a night of telling, not reading," Sienna said.

While prayer books are mostly Hebrew, much of the Haggadah, even the opening invitation to "all who are hungry," is in Aramaic, the common language at the time it was written.

Sienna said the intention was to make it understandable – which for us North Americans means using more English.

"If I invite you in a language you don't understand, I haven't invited you," he said.

Every year, we should ask: "What new traditions are [we] going to try?"

Even if last year's seder was perfect, we can't just run it over again – too much has changed in the world and in ourselves. Yet, "too many new things" can make a seder unrecognizable, he cautioned.

Sienna's favourite innovation is to make long readings bearable, especially for children, by serving not just one tiny vegetable during the early-on "Karpas" section of the seder, but a selection of appealing vegetable appetizers – even potato chips – with accompanying dips.

"You will not hear 'When do we eat?' even once."

Sienna discussed many seder foods, including horseradish, which he noted, is not the original maror (bitter herb).

Rather, like the potato that represents a "green" vegetable in many homes, it was all that was available in Russia or Poland in early spring.

Bitter lettuce or endives are far more authentic, and many families now acknowledge both traditions with an extra food, called "chazeret," on the seder plate.

The foods we serve represent freedom. According to Maimonides, Sienna said, the meal should even begin with dessert, the ultimate freedom, since "slaves have no control over the menu."

Through taste and touch, story and song, each person should come to see themselves in the narrative of Pesach.

"Telling the story is like living the story," Sienna said.

But why do we do this with this particular tale? The Chanukah story is powerful, yet we don't relive it in the same way.

Pesach, Sienna said, signifies not only our past, but also our present and future. Matzah, which represents both the food of slavery and our first taste of freedom, prepares us to treasure what Rabbi Yitz Greenberg calls the "past and future redemption of humanity."

We might make a distinction between the seder and the meal, between the cuisine and its spiritual lessons, but, said Sienna, "it's not just a meal; it's not just reading." The two are one and the same: "The seder is the meal."

Sienna presented three lessons from the Haggadah text to make any seder – modern or traditional – more interactive and meaningful.

First, the seder should be multisensory. As modern educators are discovering, different learners respond to different "modalities" – for instance auditory, tactile and visual.

The seder involves all the senses in an evening of "show and tell."

From the Four Questions, we learn that every seder should start with questions.

"But the Four Questions should not be the only four questions," Sienna said. Asking a question says: "I want to begin a conversation." Suggest that guests come prepared with questions of their own. "Some will be wonderful questions."

Finally, from the narrative of the Four Children, we learn to speak to each person differently. "Who's coming to your seder? How do they need to hear the story?"

That doesn't mean "Uncle Murray" reading the story in 20 different languages.

"The conductor doesn't play every instrument." Rather, create "openings" into the story for each individual – ask a psychiatrist to talk about different types of personalities, or a chef to bring a new charoset recipe.

"Don't do everything yourself… start with the listeners," Sienna recommended.

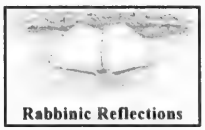
Food for thought on Pesach

By RABBI JOHN MOSCOWITZ



Rabbinic Reflections

In constructing the seder routine almost two millennia ago, the rabbis were quite explicit about the proceedings: when to dip, when to recline, when to bless, etc.

Yet they chose not to be explicit about the afikoman. The afikoman is often referred to as the "dessert" that properly concludes a good meal, a good evening.

Early Jewish and Christian sources reveal that the afikoman was associated with a post-symposium festivity among the Greeks in which they went from house to house and which may have spiralled into a drunken orgy. The rabbis knew that, and as they constructed the seder evening – borrowing liberally from the Greek symposium, a party for aristocratic men, and "Judaizing" the Greek elements – they didn't want the seder concluding with an "off-site" festivity, undermining what just took place.

"Ain maftirin achar haPesach, afikoman," they said. "It is not appropriate to wind up the Passover meal by running around town acting as though the Passover story you just discussed doesn't mean anything!"

And so the rabbis likely took this word "afikoman," left in its original language (its origin was known explicitly, at least to the early generations) and transformed its meaning from after-dinner festivity (and "dessert") as the Greeks intended it, to after-dinner activity and "dessert," as they wished it to mean. The rabbis apparently felt that, in borrowing from the Greek symposium, they couldn't keep the fun of the afikoman out – a rebellion might ensue – but they could bring the afikoman into the seder and give it a new meaning.

The authors of the Haggadah understood the attraction in retaining some aspects of the old, Greek meaning.

Hence, the afikoman is a bit mysterious, it's fun, and it still takes place at the end of the meal. By changing the meaning of the word, however, the rabbis could influence the values, the thinking, the character (to use a good Greek word) of those who sat at the seder table, young people most especially.

And by leaving the meaning of the word purposely vague, the rabbis could have it both ways: the afikoman retains the fun and mystery as the Greeks intended it and the sense of constraints which the rabbis sought.

"Ain maftirin achar haPesach": don't conclude the seder, the rabbis taught, with the afikoman, as the Greek symposium would do it, but conclude with our version of the afikoman, the piece of matzah we hide and encourage the children to locate.

Younger people – in fact, all of us, really – would finish the evening, the rabbis hoped, knowing Judaism counsels not to ignore or avoid the attractions and "desserts" of life but to use them to glorify and thank God for what's been done for us.

Four cups remember four Matriarchs

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

As we all sit at our Passover seders, the symbols of slavery and redemption fill our senses. Yet at the same time, the subtle tribute being paid to Jewish women should not be ignored.

Some of our earliest memories of preparing for the seder as children revolve around the repetition of the number four. Four questions are asked by the youngest child and four sons are questioning their parents. Four cups of wine are consumed throughout the evening and four commandments outline the minimum of our obligations. The number four weaves itself into the seder ritual and spans the imagery from start to finish. What is the significance of this number and why does it frame our commemoration of redemption?

A Jewish authority, the Maharal, states that the four cups of wine at the seder represent the four Matriarchs. These four cups create reference points and shape the progression of the seder. The Haggadah itself makes this connection for us in one of the songs we sing called Who Knows One? This song centres on the question of numbers and their significance in Judaism. The song begins: "Who knows one? I know one! One is our Lord who is in the heavens and the earth." At number four, the song states the Maharal's conclusion: four is for the four Matriarchs.

The Babylonian Talmud states that the Jewish women enslaved in Egypt modelled themselves on the four Matriarchs: Sarah, Rebecca, Leah and Rachel. In fact, according to the Talmud, it's due to the merit of the women enslaved in Egypt that the entire nation of Israel was redeemed. Yet one wonders how the Matriarchs served as models for an entire generation of women, to the point that this alone forces God's intervention for an entire people? A closer look at these biblical women answers our questions.

Women today are rightfully demanding that the Matriarchs be studied and honoured

Embodied in the model of our Matriarchs are the virtues to which all Jews strive. Each Matriarch faced her particular challenges from life and her unique challenges from the covenant. From the virtues of each woman an entire generation in Egypt could shape itself and begin a new Jewish era of fulfillment. Our Matriarchs still speak to us in their distinctive voices with their unique messages. Sarah teaches us diplomacy and respect. Rebecca teaches us kindness to all living creatures. Leah shows us the strength necessary to persevere. Rachel embodies the traits of loyalty and love. Each had good and bad qualities, and each strove for what they believed to be true justice. Each Matriarch knew that although she could not accomplish it all, she must accomplish her part.

All of Israel is redeemed because these women were used as models for a generation of women facing cruelty and hardship. Women today are rightfully demanding that the Matriarchs be studied and honoured. When we encounter the number four in our seders this year, or we pick up a cup of wine and make a blessing, perhaps a moment could be taken to pay tribute to these women.

Our Matriarchs and the Jewish women of Egypt teach us of Jewish values, goals and patience, for it is through them we learn that the journeys of a life may take longer than a lifetime.

Where is Miriam on the seder plate?

Guest Voice

By YAEL LEVINE
Edah Journal

In recent decades, feminists have looked at the Passover seder and said: "Wait a minute! Where are all the women?"

The result has been several new rituals, which continue to gain acceptance and popularity. It turns out, however, that our contemporaries were not the first generation to look for a way to bring to the seder table the role of women in Israel's redemption.

After looking at some of the texts used centuries ago, it is clear that what we call the "traditional" seder indeed has something fishy about it. What's fishy is a missing person, a missing ritual, and actually, some missing fish.

For many years, the seder was a time when Miriam, and the achievements of women, were memorialized. The most basic practice was a piece of fish placed on the seder plate to commemorate Miriam.

We have two cooked foods on the seder table – an egg and a shank bone. The Talmud explains this as reflecting the holiday's two sacrifices, the special Passover lamb and the general holiday offering.

It turns out, however, that the number of dishes at the seder wasn't fixed.

Rabbi Sherira Gaon of 10th-century Babylon noted a custom of putting three foods on the plate.

"Those three cooked foods are fish, meat and an egg, corresponding to the foods that Israel will eat in the Time to Come; fish corresponding to Leviathan, egg to Ziz [an enormous mythic and fabulous bird], and meat corresponding to wild bull." The foods symbolize the mythic creatures from the realms of sea, air and land that will be eaten in the Meal of the Righteous in the messianic times.

A second reason offered by Rav Sherira, however, is one that resonates more strongly with our generation: "There are those who put an additional cooked food in memory of Miriam, as it says, 'And I sent before you Moses, and Aaron, and Miriam.'" (Micah 6:4) According to this, Miriam and the role she fulfilled in the redemption from Egypt is represented by the third cooked food on the seder table.

This tradition is worthy of renewal in our time, in recognition of the crucial role Miriam and the righteous women in Egypt played in the Exodus. Writing a millennium ago, Rav Sherira was noting a then-living custom.

In order to explain the reason for the additional foods at the seder, it would seem that since, according to Rav Sherira, the Leviathan corresponds to the fish and the fish represents Miriam, verses about both the Leviathan and Miriam are suitable to be recited.

Another rabbi cognizant of the importance of women to the Passover story was Rabbi Abraham Grate of Prague. His 1708 Haggadah commentary explained several seder rituals, including the initial hand washing, as referring to Pharaoh's daughter Bitya and her rescue of Moses from the Nile.

Several traditional sources have drawn a connection between the four cups of wine that punctuate the seder and the four matriarchs, Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel and Leah.

And if these proto-feminist commentaries are from relatively forgotten sources, how to explain the fact that a basic interpretation of charoset revolves around women – and almost nobody knows it? According to the Talmud, charoset is in memory of the apple tree, and Rashi in his commentary makes reference to the midrash, in which the women would go to their working husbands and would conceive children between the fields. When the women were ready to give birth, they would leave their homes out of fear of the Egyptians. They would lie underneath the apple trees and give birth. Apple charoset, then, is about the fact that the Jewish women did not lose hope in those difficult times.

Rituals, even time-honoured rituals like the seder, can make room for change rooted in traditional sources. These "changes" are in fact historical corrections bringing the women's voice back in after it was somehow dropped.

As the Haggadah itself reminds us, the more one expounds on the Exodus, the more one is to be praised. In reviving these authentic and authoritative seder rituals commemorating the role of our Jewish foremothers, we can more fully tell of the going out from Egypt.

Online Haggadot, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week, we looked at some of the traditional, contemporary and children's Haggadot that you can print out and use at this year's seders. Today, we'll tour some of the most beautiful Haggadot you can find online and find out why one relatively simple Haggadah has been able to stir up both passion and criticism.

Yale University Library has put together a stunning exhibit of ancient and modern Haggadot, including the 13th-century Birds Head Haggadah. Most of the human figures have been replaced with birds' heads, probably to comply with the biblical prohibition of depicting graven images. [http://tinyurl.com/gmbup] Don't miss the Tzafonet's impressive site, which follows the evolution of the Haggadah from the 13th century to contemporary Israeli editions. If you don't speak Hebrew, you will still be impressed by the illustrations. [http://tinyurl.com/j67zz]

Even if you don't have a trip planned to London's British Library, you can still thumb through one of the jewels of its collection – the Golden Haggadah. Made around 1320 by a wealthy Jewish family in or near Barcelona, the Golden Haggadah contains 56 miniature paintings illustrating stories from Genesis and Exodus. [http://tinyurl.com/qwzsw]

Karen Roeckard has studied the evolution of the Haggadah. In the 16th century, she notes, there were approximately 25 printed Haggadot, while there are more than 3,000 versions today. For centuries, the text of the Haggadah was more or less static, but the editions were distinguished by illustrations and later by rabbinical commentaries. Real change occurred at the dawn of the 20th century when content began to be changed. In the 1970s, political Haggadot (environmental, vegetarian, egalitarian, etc.), were introduced, then, more recently, "self-liberation" Haggadot, and finally, tailor-made Haggadot. [http://tinyurl.com/kfyoc]

If you were illustrating a Haggadah, how would you depict the "ben rasha, the bad son?" Rabbi Berel Wein says that how you draw him says a lot about Jewish attitudes to the world. In early times, the bad son was "portrayed as a Greek thespian or as a Roman gladiator. In medieval times, he was either the rough, coarse, unlettered peasant or the equally brutal and cruel wandering knight. In later Haggadot, the "'bad son'" was portrayed as being foppish and a dilettante in appearance. In early 20-century American Haggadot, he appears as a member of an organized crime gang, cigarette dangling from his lips and a large hat pushed back on his head." [http://tinyurl.com/ke4oq]

I was surprised to see how much controversy can be stirred up by one Haggadah. I'm not referring to Haggadot that promoted a controversial, contemporary theme. This one just promoted coffee.

The Maxwell House Passover Haggadah is not illuminated. And it doesn't have a remarkable commentary. But many people reserve fond memories of it. A Maxwell House press release says nearly 40-million copies of its blue and white Haggadot have been distributed since the 1930s. [http://tinyurl.com/j3mvd]

Although many people remember the Maxwell House Haggadah fondly, Andrew Silow-Caroll wonders whether the no-nonsense Haggadah has left a less than favourable legacy. "Who knows how many Jewish children, numbly and obediently flipping through the… Maxwell House, came to regard the seder as a stultifying arcane ritual, a regimented recitation of thees and thous, an endurance test as lacking in levity as leaven? Is it only a coincidence that in the 70 years since Maxwell House began distributing tens of thousands of Haggadot as promotional items, the intermarriage rate among Jews has soared?" [http://http://tinyurl.com/rjh32]

Rabbi Scott Rosenberg of Temple Reyim of Newton, Mass., comes to the rescue of the Maxwell House Haggadah. He says that we owe it a great deal. [http://tinyurl.com/l5hfm] "As a product of the Great Depression, it reminds us of some of the hardships we faced as an American Jewish community struggling to survive difficult economic times. If it were not for the generosity of Maxwell House, many families during the '30s and '40s would not have had Haggadot. This classic should be part of every synagogue library."

A Haggadah that's good to the last song.

Vaughan families urged to recycle Passover waste

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Families celebrating Passover in the city of Vaughan are being encouraged to recycle their waste products rather than toss them in the garbage.

To ease the transition over the holiday, the city is permitting unlimited amounts of recyclable materials and free garbage tags, which permit families to bag more waste than they would under phase one of the city's Greening Vaughan initiative.

However, citizens of Vaughan will have to change the way they sort their garbage if they wish to meet the requirements that will be fully implemented by September 2007, said Ward 5 Councillor Alan Shefman.

He said Vaughan is in the midst of a three-phase transition period of waste reduction and increased recycling. At the end of that period, families will be charged if they exceed garbage bag limits.

In phase one, which concludes on Nov. 10, households are limited to four bags of garbage, though families are allowed to exceed that amount if they place a free tag on their bags.

In phase two, the limit will be reduced to three bags and a fee will be charged for extra tags. In addition, the green wet waste box will be introduced.

In phase three, which will kick off on Sept. 10, 2007, the three bag limit will be retained but garbage collection will go from once a week to once every two weeks.

The limitation on waste materials hits larger families harder than most, Shefman acknowledged, and so he has been in dialogue with rabbis and members of the Orthodox community to encourage large families to participate in the Greening Vaughan initiative.

"The idea is to cut down the amount of waste," cut costs and divert it from landfills, he said.

When the recycling and waste reduction program was launched a few months ago, "we got a flurry of e-mails and calls saying, 'We can't do it.' We explained it can be done. It's not an issue that's going away."

The City of Vaughan is "trying to be responsive to the community and large families in particular," Shefman said, adding that when the program is fully implemented, exceptions may be made for very large families.

Movie event planned to support Israel Elwyn

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Moshe Greengarten and David Rechtsman give far more than lip service to their support of Israel Elwyn.

As chair and treasurer respectively of Canadian Friends of Israel Elwyn, an organization that provides services for more than 1,600 children and adults with special needs, the two stuff envelopes, make calls, raise money and provide hands-on leadership to board members and volunteers.

Currently, they are in the midst of planning a movie event at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival being held at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre on May 7.

The Birthday Party, a documentary by Ruth Walk, Israel's current Laureate of the Prize of the Art of Cinema, is the story of 25 child Holocaust survivors who for 40 years have marked May 5 as the day of their liberation and the date they have all taken as their official birthday.

All funds raised at the Canadian premiere of the film will go toward the endowment of a speech and communications therapy room in a new Israel Elwyn children's facility.

Greengarten, associate director of Hay Health Care Consulting Group, has been involved with the organization for five years, he says, since he learned about it while in Israel.

He met with Elwyn executive director David Marcu and "came on board, but it wasn't until about two years later that I visited some of its programs and realized just how wonderful the organization is."

David Rechtsman and Moshe Greengarten

Its services include preschool and adult development centres, work activities centres, supported employment services and transitional employment programs.

"Elwyn's work wasn't well known in Canada, and I felt that with my skills and my experience on boards, my passion for its work could come across."

Greengarten has been president and chair of professional health care boards such as the Ontario Hospital Association, and has been involved with Baycrest and Bialik Hebrew Day School.

His first visit to an Elwyn program was to one of its preschool centres, a project of Canadian Friends of Israel Elwyn, "and the kids just grabbed me. I realized there were issues with the facility. It needed to be made wheelchair accessible," he says.

He also visited an adult program whose focus is to integrate clients into the community through vocational training, supportive residences or workplace placement.

"Their measure of success is how many people move into the community and I get goose bumps when I think about how successful they are. The program is designed to help people feel valued," Greengarten said.

"Its mission is to bring up standards of social service in Israel, and improve the quality of life for the vulnerable."

He was "hooked", he says, and "didn't need to convince David to get involved."

Major life insurers revise Israel travel guidelines

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Manulife Financial, Transamerica Life Canada and Sun Life Financial, three of the country's largest insurers, are advising brokers and distributors that they have revised their foreign travel guidelines to permit the sale of life insurance to travellers who visit Israel.

Manulife, Canada's largest insurer and the second-largest in North America, issued guidelines recently that advised retailers, "It may be possible to cover travel to Israel (excluding West Bank, Gaza and Golan Heights), Bahrain, Qatar and United Arab Emirates for up to eight weeks on a standard basis if the applicant is under age 75."

The advisory followed one from Sun Life, which states, "For life coverage, travel to rateable countries for a maximum of eight weeks annually can now be considered for standard rates. Previously, in order to qualify for standard rates, travel was limited to a maximum of four weeks annually."

"Manulife has been at the forefront of assisting me with helping to obtain a positive response and clarification on the Israel travel issue for the past two years," said David Brown, partner with insurer and financial planner Al G. Brown & Associates.

Brown has been among a number of agents working to convince insurers to lift restrictions on life insurance sales to people visiting Israel. Until recently, policy issuers declined to write life insurance to individuals who planned to visit Israel for prolonged periods. Re-insurers, which assume much of the risk, were convinced that travel to Israel was too dangerous and declined to back such policies.

Brown contended that these fears were not grounded in statistical data.

Responding to concerns expressed by insurance retailers, insurance companies have been issuing policies that excluded liability for policy holders while they were in Israel over a certain length of time, or which charged travellers higher premiums.

Brown cautioned that while the large insurers will now write policies for visitors to Israel, there is no blanket promise of coverage. The Manulife advisory's second paragraph states: "The underwriter will consider factors such as plan reinsurer, length of travel, applicant's age and underwriting assessment when determining if travel to a particular country is insurable. The travel risk for countries are reviewed regularly, and if the risk changes, then the underwriting position will also change."

USDS deals with mould concerns

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

United Synagogue Day School is following up on its promise to fix the mould problem at its Richmond Hill branch and to take steps to ensure the related communication breakdown does not recur.

Parents at the branch were furious to learn late last month that mould had been found last fall in two classrooms and two offices. A Nov. 29 report by consultants Pinchin Environmental Ltd. detailed the damage and made recommendations including communication of the report's findings.

In a letter to parents last Friday, USDS board president Allen Gales and head of school Lucy Cohen said the school's board of directors determined at a recent meeting that "due diligence was exercised to ensure the safety of our children and staff, particularly by proactively taking the initiative to have an assessment done."

Gales and Cohen added, however, that there was "clearly a breakdown in internal communication… that may have led the school to conclude wrongly that there was no need to communicate" the findings.

At a meeting Mar. 29 between parents and school representatives, Gales said the school's decision not to communicate the report's findings to parents and staff was based on conversations with Pinchin representatives before the report was received. Parents, angered over what they consider a potential health risk, as well as their ability to trust the school, demanded accountability from him and Cohen.

In last week's letter, Gales and Cohen outlined the steps the school is taking:

- The damage was scheduled to be repaired over Passover.
- The rooms will remain closed until Pinchin confirms that mould has been removed.
- The school is creating a parent-led safety and wellness committee to ensure proper handling of related concerns. The school's executive vice-president, Brian Klar, who is a physician, has been asked to chair the committee.
- All staff will be required to report safety and wellness concerns to the committee, which will be responsible for dealing with them "within a reasonable time."

Gales and Cohen invited parents from each campus to join the committee.

Sculpture inspires Baycrest resident

Art can have a profound effect on a person, just ask Helen Rynski.

The 86-year-old resident of Baycrest's Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, remembers the day she went outside for a walk and spotted a 15-foot, whimsical Ian Leventhal sculpture in the courtyard.

"The first time I saw it, I knew I had to make it," said Rynski, whose youthful spirit belies her age.

With a little help from Brenda Lass, who works in Baycrest's Creative Arts Studio, and volunteer Marvin Fagan, Rynski created a stunning miniature model out of pottery clay. The 20-inch sculpture is her interpretation of Leventhal's The Sky Watchers, and it is as colourful and fun-spirited as the original.

Asked why she felt so emotionally stirred by Leventhal's piece, Rynski said that it was "just a feeling" she had. The project took Rynski more than a year to complete and involved building the sculpture from the base upward, and painting and firing each of the different parts in the kiln.

"Here in the creative arts room we make people into artists, even when they were not artists before," said Lass. "They feel a great sense of purpose when they are able to give gifts they created to their families, or produce works of art and hand-painted cards to be sold in our store or displayed in silent auctions."

Leventhal learned of Rynski's project and dropped by to meet the budding artist and her creation. He was bowled over by her beautiful design.

"The piece is so happy and whimsical, it captures the essence of my sculpture outside," said the Toronto-born artist whose artwork can be found on display in restaurants, hotels, libraries, malls, banks and hospitals from Toronto to Tel Aviv. Colour, fantasy and humour are hallmarks of Leventhal's style – and he has said that all his pieces have one simple message: "joy and happiness."

Rynski's inspired creation carries the same message. "I fell in love with it and I knew I just had to have this piece," said Leventhal.

When he learned her sculpture was entered in the silent auction at Baycrest's annual Art & Soul fundraiser in March, Leventhal made sure to put in the highest bid for it. Then in a move that is characteristic of his philanthropic nature, he promptly donated it back to Baycrest to be displayed in a public area for everyone to enjoy.

"Art is important for all ages," said Leventhal, who teaches art classes to young children. "Unfortunately many children give up art when they reach their early teens, so this makes me extremely happy to see someone in later life picking up art."

"For me I never had an ambition to do such a thing and all of a sudden I had to do it," said Rynski.

The Sky Watchers are smiling more than usual today.

Helen Rynski is seen here with artist Ian Leventhal and her mini sculpture of Leventhal's original work, The Sky Watchers, which is on display in a courtyard at Baycrest.

Darfur benefit raises money and awareness

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A benefit concert organized to raise money to end the genocide in Darfur attracted a capacity crowd at a University of Toronto pub last week.

More than 100 people attended the event called Live Aid, organized by Students Taking Action Now: Darfur (STAND) and Tzedec Hillel. They raised more than $1,000 for the OXFAM Darfur fund.

Since 2003, a conflict over land between African farmers and Arabic nomads has escalated into a violent war between African guerrilla groups and the Arabic Janjaweed.

To date, more than 400,000 people have been killed, about two million are displaced, and millions more are suffering from starvation, exposure, and disease. It is feared that the death toll could reach a million if the international community doesn't interfere.

Eleanore Gann, the president of STAND at U of T, said she was encouraged by the number of students who came out to support the cause so soon before the exam period is set to begin.

"Not only did people come up to me, but they went to people on the committee to say that it was a really great evening and that they wanted to get involved with STAND," Gann said.

"I hope this event will act as a catalyst for increased advocacy. The general apathy now is really disheartening," she added.

Throughout the evening, students were treated to live music performed by U of T band Jasper Flat, jazz vocalist Sarah Jorram, African drumming, spoken word and even a comedy sketch.

The organizers also held a raffle and gave out prizes – gift certificates, tickets to a concert and an overnight stay at the Sheraton hotel in Toronto.

> 'I hope this event will act as a catalyst for increased advocacy'

But, Gann said, they made an effort to balance out the evening by entertaining while raising consciousness.

A 10-minute video clip of an eye-witness account from a front-line aid worker who works with the International Red Cross was shown, and Jonathan Laski, the media director of STAND Canada also addressed the gathering.

"He explained what is happening in Darfur and talked about STAND's goal of education and humanitarian aid. He also gave a heartfelt plea for people to care," Gann said.

Organizers encouraged people to sign a petition that calls on the United Nations to appoint a full-time envoy to Darfur as well as an intervention force to bring security to the region.

Jewish regeneration depends on intermarriage: prof

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

"A shiksa, not bad."

That's the phrase that Sander Gilman, a professor at Atlanta's Emory University and the author and editor of more than 70 books, used to conclude his lecture at the University of Toronto last month in an attempt to convince his audience that intermarriage is what will regenerate the Jewish people.

About 40 people gathered March 22 at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life to hear Gilman speak about "Multiculturalism and the Jews: The Melting Pot." His talk was sponsored by Beth Tzedec Congregation.

"It is the sickly, the pale, the bent, the ill Jew who is going to be resuscitated… through marriage with shiksas," Gilman said.

"The big question that was asked 100 years ago was can Jews be integrated into western Diaspora, Christian culture? If they can be integrated, how can they be integrated?" Gilman said, adding that he believes Jews can be integrated without disappearing into the mix.

Sandor Gilman

He explained that two models arose from this "big question." One was called cultural pluralism, which imagined a group of cultures existing parallel to one another. The other model, he said, uses the idea of "hybridity," or the melting pot, in which different cultures combine into one.

Gilman referred to a hit Broadway play in New York in 1908 called The Melting Pot, written by a British Jew named Israel Zangwill, who Gilman said was perhaps the most important English-speaking Jew of the 20th century.

Former U.S. president Theodore Roosevelt saw the play, which was about immigrants living in America, and said it stood in opposition to all hyphenated Americanism, Gilman said.

He added that Zangwill himself married a non-Jewish woman. To those who shunned him after he decided to intermarry, Zangwill wrote that his wife shared the same Jewish ideals as he did. Zangwill said that Judaism is spiritual, and that his opponents were attempting to make it racial in their comments about intermarriage.

Gilman said that Zangwill wrote in the appendix to The Melting Pot that "intermarriage will follow wherever social intimacy exists. Jews need intermarriage. It is not only a model or metaphor of hybridity, it is that which will regenerate the Jews."

Gilman said that hybridity is not about assimilating into a dominant culture, but about "whether there can be an ideal society where Jews as Jews can function."

He compared the idea of a melting pot to a symphony, in which every musician's contribution is valued.

"To survive, you must be regenerated, you must be healthy, you must be able to contribute to that new world symphony.

"The Jews with their violins, the Scots with their bagpipes and the Canadians with their – whatever Canadians play. And out of that comes the new world symphony. It is not that the Jew vanishes, but that he becomes a part of their new hybrid world in which the Jews' contribution is valid."

He added that North Americans who oppose racism should embrace the model of hybridity.

"When we start to think today of what we demand of those who we wish to admit and not admit into Canadian, North American or U.S. culture, we should keep in mind the metaphor of the symphony and ask whether or not hybridity, the urge to integrate into the world, is one model, which, as much as we wish to deny it, that has the power to break down barriers, that no other model does."

Campus anti-Semitism condemned

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Anti-Semitism on U.S. campuses is a "serious problem" that merits a campaign to inform Jewish students of their rights, the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights said last week.

The commission announced its position April 3 after considering testimony last year from the American Jewish Congress, the Zionist Organization of America, the Institute for Jewish and Community Research and other groups.

It cited anti-Israel propaganda on campus that exploits longtime stereotypes, and it urged the U.S. Education Department to run a campaign to inform Jewish students of their right to be free of harassment and to collect data on anti-Semitic and other hate crimes at universities.

It also concluded there is "substantial evidence" some university departments of Middle East studies "may repress legitimate debate concerning Israel."

Liberal U.S. rabbi advises leftists to get spiritual

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A spiritual crisis in the western world is leading millions of people to seek comfort in the religious right, said Rabbi Michael Lerner, the editor of Tikkun Magazine.

"It is a spiritual crisis that is about the deprivation of recognition, the deprivation of love, the deprivation of meaning in life, and this is central to the experience that has led them to the right," he said.

Rabbi Lerner was in Toronto last week to promote his book The Left Hand of God. He spoke at a lecture titled, "Taking back our country from the religious right" in an event at the University of Toronto organized by the Social Justice and Democracy Program at Ryerson University and co-sponsored by Tikkun Toronto, Kairos, the Muslim Canadian Congress, the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims, the Ontario Public Service Employees' Union, and the Canadian Auto Workers Union.

Rabbi Lerner told more than 200 audience members that only after doing focus group research with thousands of people to find out why middle-income Americans are moving to the right – even though doing so goes against their economic interests – did he begin to understand that people are desperate to find a higher purpose to their lives and abandon the "ethos of materialism and selfishness."

He said the religious right has only identified the problem in America, but it hasn't come up with a solution.

Meanwhile, the left "doesn't have a clue about the spiritual crisis in America… When it hears about the spiritual crisis, it assumes that spirituality is new-age mush… and that spirituality is a code word for people who can't think straight," the San Francisco rabbi said.

The left is unwelcoming to people who believe in God, he added.

"A general sense that was conveyed was that if you're into God or into religion, you are probably on a lower level of psychological or intellectual development than the rest of us, and this message is conveyed in many subtle ways."

He said leftists need to put an end to a culture that puts down spiritual people and stop thinking of spirituality as something that could pollute them.

The left needs to address the spiritual crisis and make leftists more accepting of religious people, he added.

Capitalism teaches people to act in their own self-interest, to view others in a utilitarian way and to look out for number 1 in the workplace, he said.

Inevitably, they pass this philosophy on to their children.

"Thousands and thousands of people told us stories about how they hate it. On one hand, they feel like this is the real world and there is nothing we can do to change it. On the other hand, they feel dirty by being a part of this world, that they would really like their lives to connect to a higher meaning and purpose," Rabbi Lerner said.

Rabbi Michael Lerner

"The major complaint that people had was 'I feel surrounded in my personal life by people who are just out for number 1.' And they weren't being paranoid. They were correctly perceiving that everybody around them were learning the same things they were learning."

Unfortunately, this mentality is seeping into our personal relationships, which suffer as a result, he said.

The way people date each other is a symptom of this, he added.

The habit of trying to have different experiences is like going to a "supermarket of relationships," and people are using their partners to fulfill their own selfish needs, such as wanting to raise a family or buy a house, he said.

"More and more people, when they enter into committed relationships or marriages, do so with a conscious or unconscious calculation that says something like this: 'Of all the people who would fall for me, this one will fulfill more of my needs than anyone else.'"

He said this can cause insecurity, because you can never be sure that your partner may find someone else who can fulfill more of his or her needs.

But a spiritually conscious person wouldn't think about whether a partner will fulfill a superficial need like impressing a boss or being a good cook.

The "spiritual consciousness" is being able to "look at another being and see in them embodiments of the sacred as created in the image of God, as fundamentally deserving of love and caring for who they are," Rabbi Lerner said.

He said the key to a more fulfilling life is to change what we value from money and power to love and caring.

Student sues JDL, Hillel for terrorist claims

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A U.S. student accused of having links to terrorists is threatening to sue two Jewish groups if allegations against him are not retracted immediately.

Fadi Kiblawi, a third-year law student at George Washington University, said last month he would sue Hillel and the Jewish Defense League if they don't retract statements claiming he is a terrorist and associates with suicide bombers, according to the GW Hatchet, an independent student newspaper.

Kiblawi told the Hatchet he filed a complaint with University Police regarding an e-mail sent recently through the Hillel listserv. At an Israel divestment lecture March 27, where Kiblawi spoke, members and supporters of the Jewish Defence League distributed flyers alleging that Kiblawi has said "kill the Jews," and has also voiced a desire to "strap a bomb to one's chest and kill."

Kiblawi denied the charges, the paper reported, saying the remarks were taken out of context in one instance and in another, sent out in an e-mail in his name under false pretenses.

The Hillel e-mail referred to alleged Kiblawi statements to encourage Jewish students to attend the lecture, said Robert Fishman, the campus Hillel director.

Auschwitz escapee succumbs to cancer

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Rudolf Vrba, one of only five Jews to escape from the Auschwitz death camp, died on March 27 after a battle with cancer. He was 82.

Rudolph Vrba in 2000

Born in Topolcany, Slovakia, as Walter Rosenberg, Vrba is credited with saving 100,000 Jews, thanks to the information he revealed following his escape.

Vrba spent nearly two years in Auschwitz-Birkenau, where his jobs as part of Kanada Kommando – a work detail that collected and sorted prisoner's belongings – and later as a camp clerk gave him first-hand knowledge of the death toll of incoming Jews. By the time of his escape in spring 1944, Vrba and the camp underground estimated that 1.75 million Jews had been killed a figure far higher than accepted today by most historians.

In early 1944, Vrba and others in the camp learned that preparations were under way to receive hundreds of thousands of Hungarian Jews. He and a fellow prisoner, Alfred Wetzler, decided to attempt an escape to warn them of the fate that awaited them.

On April 7, they left the camp and ventured into an area manned by guards at an outer perimeter known as Mexico, where temporary wooden structures were being prepared for the influx of Hungarian Jews. With the help of other prisoners, they hid inside a lumber pile for three days, covering themselves in a mixture of tobacco and petrol to mask their scent from guard dogs.

When the search for them ended, they left the woodpile and headed south toward Slovakia. When they arrived, they met with members of the Judenrat, the Jewish community council, in Zilina and told their incredible story, warning that Hungarian Jewry was in danger. They provided detailed information about camp operations and a sketch of its layout.

Their testimony became the basis for the Vrba-Wetzler Report, also known as the Auschwitz Protocols, which found its way to the highest political leadership in the western world.

However, 60 years after the liberation of Auschwitz, Vrba told The CJN he felt the information had been buried, leaving Hungarian Jews in the dark as to their fate. Instead of being warned and either resisting deportation or hiding, the community meekly boarded the trains that brought them to Auschwitz.

Vrba believed the Jewish community leadership used the information to bargain their way to safety in a special sealed train that left Budapest just as the wholesale slaughter of Jews was reaching a fever pitch.

When interviewed by The CJN for an article marking the 60th anniversary of the liberation of Auschwitz, Vrba said historical documents confirm that Jewish leaders in Slovakia, Hungary, Switzerland and elsewhere knew by May 1944 what was happening in Auschwitz, but they did not warn Hungarian Jews.

Instead, they used the information to "organize a train of 1,700 that travelled to Switzerland."

Vrba acknowledged that conclusion was controversial and not accepted by many mainstream historians.

"A situation developed and that is my contention, that a small group of informed people deprived others from making their own decisions in the face of mortal danger. This is my opinion," Vrba said.

"Certainly they should not have negotiated the departure of a small train and let 437,000 land in Auschwitz, not knowing anything."

Stopping 'genocidal' Iran a priority for Cotler

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Montreal MP now public security critic

MONTREAL — MP Irwin Cotler, now the Liberals' public security critic, said he will be sounding the alarm over the "clear and present danger" posed by Iran and the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority during this Parliament.

The former justice minister said in an interview he could not overstate how serious the threat is to Israel and the Jewish people of "an explosion of state-sanctioned genocidal anti-Semitism whose epicentre is Iran."

He said he takes Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad at his word when he says that he wants to "wipe Israel of the map," and Hamas as well, as long as the same intention remains in its covenant.

Cotler said it's imperative that Iran not be able to develop nuclear weapons capability, but he stopped short of calling for sanctions against the country.

He compared Ahmadinejad's denial of the Holocaust and "demonizing of Jews as evil incarnate" as a threat to Jews worldwide.

Canada should have nothing to do with a Hamas-led Palestinian Authority unless it "repeals its covenant, renounces violence, recognizes Israel and adheres to the road map [peace plan]," Cotler said.

He also adds to those conditions ending "anti-Semitic incitement" and a "culture of impunity" in which Palestinians attacking Israelis are hailed as resisters, not criminals.

While pleased with the Harper government's decision to cut aid to the Hamas administration, Cotler said the Tories "had no choice" because Canadian law prohibits providing assistance to groups on Canada's list of terrorist groups.

Cotler is the sole Canadian on the steering committee for a forum of world Jewish leaders being convened by Israeli President Moshe Katsav in October to discuss the future of the Jewish people.

As for matters closer to home, Cotler said he will be advocating strict adherence to the Charter of Human Rights and the rule of law in any counter-terrorism measures that Canada institutes.

Cotler met with Muslim leaders in Markham, Ont., last month to reassure them that the anti-terrorism law, enacted in the aftermath of 9/11, is not a "threat" to them. He said he told them that there can be no discriminatory application of the law, including racial profiling.

Cotler defended the use of security certificates to detain suspected terrorists indefinitely without charge, noting that this did not begin with the anti-terrorism act, but has, in fact, been legal for close to 30 years. He said it has earlier been used to detain suspected war criminals. All democracies have in place a similar remedy, he added.

"It's a Hobbesian choice between indefinite incarceration or deportation, which is not always possible because no one will take them or the person would be in danger if sent back," Cotler said. The Federal Court of Appeal, in December, 2004, ruled that security certificates are constitutional, he noted.

Nevertheless, Cotler believes alternatives should be studied, such as supervised release or house arrest.

As for the criticism that detainees are not given access to all the evidence against them, Cotler said the appointment of a "friend of the court," to whom evidence could be disclosed, might make these powers more compatible with democratic principles.

Now that he is no longer in the cabinet, Cotler intends to resume acting on behalf of Maher Arar, the Syrian-Canadian who was deported by the United States as a suspected terrorist to Syria, where he was held for a year in solitary confinement and allegedly tortured. Arar is seeking redress from the U.S. and answers on Canadian law-enforcement officials' role in his arrest.

Cotler said he is also going to work to find a made-in-Canada civil remedy for citizens who are victims of torture or terror abroad. He believes they should be able to sue in Canadian courts those states responsible. If a state found guilty does not pay up, Canada could seize any assets it has in this country or hold them accountable through various international justice mechanisms.

"This would be an important symbolic initiative," Cotler said.

Vrba moved to Canada in 1967

The Auschwitz Protocols prompted several world leaders, including Pope Pius XII, U.S. president Franklin D. Roosevelt and the king of Sweden, to appeal to the Hungarian head of state, Admiral Miklos Horthy, to stop the deportations. The requests and fear of postwar retribution led the Hungarian to stop the deportations on July 9, 1944.

After the war, Vrba, who changed his name from Rosenberg when he joined the Czechoslovak resistance in September 1944, settled for a time in Israel. He published his memoirs, I Cannot Forgive, in 1963. He moved to Canada in 1967 and became a Canadian citizen in 1972.

According to Wikipedia, an online encyclopedia, Vrba was named an associate professor of pharmacology at the University of British Columbia, specializing in neurology. He became known internationally for more than 50 research papers on the chemistry of the brain, and for his work on diabetes and cancer. In 1998, he received the title of doctor of philosophy honoris causa from the University of Haifa "in recognition of his heroism and daring in exposing, during the war itself, the horrors of Auschwitz, which action led to the saving of Jewish lives; and in profound appreciation of his educational contribution and devotion to spreading knowledge about the Holocaust."

Vrba appeared as a witness at the Frankfurt Auschwitz trial in 1964 and at the Zundel "false news" trial in Toronto in 1985, where his testimony helped lead to the conviction – later overturned on constitutional grounds – of the neo-Nazi propagandist.

He is survived by his wife, Robin, his daughter, Zuza, and two grandchildren.

France's Jewish community fighting anti-Semitism: CRIF head

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Jewish community of France is not going to give in to the scourge of anti-Semitism that is destroying the country.

"We have decided to fight. The Israelis set the example for us every day," says Roger Cukierman, president of the CRIF, the umbrella group for French Jews.

Cukierman is at the forefront of the battle that the Jewish community and the French state are currently waging against anti-Semitism.

The CJN recently interviewed Cukierman from his home in Paris.

Canadian Jewish News: The assassination of Ilan Halimi in February plunged the French Jewish community into disarray.

Roger Cukierman: The Jews of France are saddened, upset and nervous. The infamous murder of young Ilan Halimi was a terrible shock. It's the first Jewish death resulting from a horrible crime, one that was clearly anti-Semitic. This despicable assassination had a strong effect on the entire Jewish community of France.

There were large demonstrations on Feb. 26 – almost 100,000 people in the streets of Paris and several thousand in the country. You would think that this abject murder would have served as a lesson to everyone and we would finally become aware of how anti-Semitic prejudices can lead to catastrophic situations. But, instead of having the calm period we were all hoping for after this drama, there was an outbreak of violence. It was as if this vile assassination had given sick ideas to many simple minds, to the point where someone recently told me that there had been signs in some areas calling on people to donate money to pay for the defence of the gangster chief who planned the kidnapping and murder of Ilan Halimi.

CJN: For French Jews, it must be a difficult situation.

Cukierman: It's a disturbing situation for all of France, not just for the Jews. I recently sent out a communiqué in which I asserted that France is in danger. In it, I reminded people that the CRIF and the French Jewish community had been relieved to note a decrease in anti-Semitic acts in 2005. But the first statistics for 2006 have shown an increase again, which is cruelly illustrated by the assassination of young Ilan Halimi and the anti-Jewish violence in Sarcelles and Lyon. In some areas where there the authorities don't have much control, groups of racist, anti-Semitic hoodlums are spreading terror. In many suburbs and in the heart of some cities, Jewish citizens are afraid to go out, and Jewish parents worry about their children.

Despite the many steps that have been taken, especially by the police, things are getting worse. We keep warning the French authorities: this very serious situation may well lead people to react in self-defence and we will have no control over their actions. We must recall that since the beginning of the wave of anti-Semitism that started in September 2000, there has not been a single Jewish act of retaliation.

We are asking the French president to officially declare war on anti-Semitism and to restore a feeling of confidence in all of the country's citizens. We ask parents, teachers and the media to mobilize against this scourge. Because, make no mistake! The Jews are the guardians of the republic. Violence against them today will strike the rest of the population tomorrow. The unity of the French nation is in danger.

CJN: Are you saying that if they have no other choice, Jews may undertake their own defence? Isn't that surprising in a democratic state such as France?

Cukierman: There is great uneasiness and a feeling of helplessness in the Jewish community. Since the beginning of this wave of anti-Semitism, small Jewish groups have been forming. But until now, there have not been any acts of self-defence. With my communiqué, I wanted to put the government on guard against the fact that the current situation is in danger of exacerbating things and promoting actions that we would not be able to control.

> The Jews are the guardians of the republic

CJN: Is the French government aware that the situation is so serious?

Cukierman: Absolutely. The French government is in the front line of the fight against anti-Semitism. It is even considering widely distributing video systems to check up on the streets and neighbourhoods that are the most dangerous. But we have to be realistic. You can't put a police officer beside every Jew.

CJN: Is there a link between the riots in France last fall and this new outbreak of anti-Semitic acts?

Cukierman: No, because curiously enough, the wave of violence last fall did not touch the Jews. There was only one incident involving a synagogue in one suburb. The Jewish institutions were not attacked. The rioters attacked primarily the symbols of the French state: public monuments, schools, public administration buildings… We saw this as a positive indication, but obviously, we were wrong.

CJN: You recently returned from the United States where you met with the principal leaders of the American Jewish community. The American view of France has been getting increasingly negative for several years now.

Cukierman: I attended the American Israel Public Affairs Committee conference in Washington. The Americans I met were all greatly affected by the death of Ilan Halimi. They knew about the case, and they all expressed their solidarity. This wasn't something that went unnoticed in the United States. It's true that this horrible incident and other recent anti-Semitic acts have tarnished the image of France in foreign countries, especially in America. It's somewhat unjust because the government and most of the French politicians are making a real effort and have shown complete solidarity with us in our daily battle against anti-Semitism.

CJN: Doesn't France's traditional pro-Arab and pro-Palestinian policy indirectly contribute to the climate of anti-Semitism?

Cukierman: France's Middle East policy has changed in the last year. Last year, at the annual CRIF dinner, I strongly criticized the warm welcome the French government had given [former Palestinian Authority president] Yasser Arafat when he was hospitalized in Paris, as well as the authorization that allowed the anti-Semitic network Al-Manar to broadcast in French territory for one month. This year, at the dinner on Feb. 20, I thanked the French authorities for the change in their foreign policy in the Middle East.

France, in close consultation with the United States, demanded and got the withdrawal of Syria from Lebanon. I think the motivating element was the Syrians' assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri, a close friend of French President Jacques Chirac. France showed that it could be very firm with Syria.

In the same spirit, at the end of July 2005, France warmly welcomed [Israeli Prime Minister] Ariel Sharon, for the first time in four years. France was also impressed with Israel's withdrawal from Gaza. For about a year, there has been a change in the direction of French policy in the Middle East. On the other hand, however, there continues to be a general atmosphere of anti-Zionism, especially in left-wing circles, which, in a way, justifies anti-Semitism.

CJN: More and more Jews are leaving France. Some North American journals are even speaking of an "exodus." Does this phenomenon, which seems unavoidable, bother you?

Cukierman: That is something that has been talked about a great deal, but has not actually had much impact. In recent years, the number of Jews who have left France for Israel is between 2,500 and 3,000 a year, which is 0.5 per cent of the Jewish population of France. It's a comparatively low number… It's ridiculous to talk about an "exodus." It's an alarmist expression that in no way reflects reality.

CJN: How do you see the future of the Jews and Judaism in France? Are you optimistic or pessimistic?

Cukierman: I am concerned, but we have decided to fight. We have to follow the example of the Israelis. When there are problems, we must face them and not run away from them. I am counting on our ability to face them. The communiqué we recently sent out – which I mentioned before – is a warning message addressed to all of French society. Anti-Semitism in France is not just a Jewish problem. It is a problem for all of French society. Today, French society is clearly in danger. If it allows sharia law to spread and organized gangs of hoodlums take control of certain neighbourhoods or suburbs, it is the essence of the democratic spirit that will be destroyed.

Post, Globe and Star agree on cutting off Hamas

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On March 29, Foreign Minister Peter MacKay announced that Canada is ending its funding of, and diplomatic relations with, the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority, while continuing to provide humanitarian aid to the Palestinian people via non-governmental organizations and the United Nations. This decision was greeted positively on the editorial pages of most Canadian newspapers.

The National Post editorial "Cutting off Hamas," March 30, commended the move. It said that the demands MacKay placed on Hamas "are not new. Since the terrorist group won the recent Palestinian election, the United States, the European Union and even Russia have told Hamas that renouncing the exterminationist hatred embedded in the group's founding covenant is a pre-condition for normal relations. Yet Hamas has refused, betting that the world will not call its bluff."

The Globe and Mail ran two editorials on the topic.

In "Keep Hamas in the cold," March 30, the Globe said MacKay "described the situation succinctly. 'The stated platform of this government has not addressed the concerns raised by Canada and others concerning non-violence, the recognition of Israel and acceptance of previous agreements and obligations, including the road map for peace.'"

The second Globe editorial, "Uh, Earth to Hamas," April 1, responded to the "injured innocence" of PA Deputy Prime Minister Nasser Shaer who, when interviewed about the Canadian cuts, protested: "We are a people under occupation. We need help. Did we do anything? Has something happened that was done by Palestinians?"

The editorial states: "The reason… is no mystery and Mr. Shaer knows it very well, despite his pantomime of puzzlement. Hamas is a terrorist organization. It has carried out something like 60 attacks against Israelis since 2000."

And in the midst of its current truce, Hamas continues to praise terror attacks carried out by others, while making no attempt to arrest the participants.

The Toronto Star editorial "Slam Hamas, not aid," March 31, approved of ending direct funding for Hamas, as long as humanitarian assistance continues. Prime Minister Stephen Harper, the Star said, "ought to send the Palestinian people a message of hope by turning over any suspended Canadian aid to the United Nations or relief agencies. The goal would be to maintain the overall level of our assistance to the 3.5 million mostly very poor residents of the West Bank and Gaza."

However, Star columnists such as Haroon Siddiqui and Linda McQuaig dissented.

In "He's aping Bush and seems too fond of secrecy," April 2, McQuaig took aim at the new Harper government, including the decision to cut funding to Hamas. However, she failed to mention that humanitarian aid would continue, leaving the impression that the Canadian government was being hard-hearted.

More seriously, McQuaig wrote that "according to John Sigler, professor of international relations at Carleton University" Hamas "has agreed to 'accept' Israel (within its pre-1967 borders) and to permanently honour any peace agreement the two sides work out" which "is as good as 'recognition.' It should at least be regarded as an opening, to be encouraged by governments like Canada."

This is fatuous. When some in Hamas refer to the 1967 borders, it is clearly only a temporary step toward the goal that's clearly stated in the Hamas covenant – destruction of the Jewish state. Even this temporary situation must be accompanied by the "right" of Palestinian refugees to return to Israel, thereby ensuring the elimination of Israel as a Jewish state.

The new PA Foreign Minister Mahmoud al-Zahar at least is more straightforward about Hamas's aims. On April 2, he told the Chinese news agency Xinhua that "there is no place for the state of Israel on [Islamic] land." Al-Zahar is only reiterating the Hamas covenant. McQuaig, and others who defend Hamas, ought to take the time to read it.

On April 2, Sunday Edition host Michael Enright sat down with three young Palestinian activists in Bethlehem to discuss the Israeli elections and Hamas's new role, but, with some exceptions, he failed to ask tough questions on critical issues.

When he raised the issue of the "right of return," Enright did not question how this could be reconciled with his guests' declaration that they favoured a two-state solution – a position that became all the more confusing when a couple of the activists, including one who voted for Hamas, indicated that they favoured what appeared to be a bi-national solution.

Following this 45-minute interview, Enright probed Israeli journalist Isabel Kershner, an editor at Jerusalem Report and author of Barrier: The Seam of the Israeli-Palestinian Conflict, about Israel's security barrier. He asked her some hard-hitting questions – what listeners might have expected during the whole show.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

200 agents and counting: "make life easier, and they will come"

Murray Goldkind

Murray and Sol Goldkind, Broker/Owners of Sutton Group Admiral Realty, are often asked: "How do you attract the more than 200 top agents in your office in such record time?" The reply is always the same: "By maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle."

"What an agent wants is to sell real estate, pure and simple," says Murray. "That's what we help them do. We give them the tools and the 24-hour-a-day marketing and sales support they need, when they need it, and we provide an atmosphere that is second to none."

Top agents are look for service-oriented environments without rigid structure. That means access to the latest computer facilities and a full complement of the latest personal marketing and career management software and tools. Sutton Group Admiral uses a "fee-for-service" concept which allows agents to pick and choose the services they want. In this way there are never any hidden costs passed on to an agent, nor are agents ever penalized by waste generated by others. In other words, each agent acts as his or her own businessperson, and enjoys the benefit of controlling their bottom line.

Timing isn't everything, it's just 98%, and as timing goes Sutton Group Admiral is proud to provide the concept that serves their clients and agents without compromise, both now and in the future.

Dutch-Jewish diplomat plans to emigrate

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Dutch Consul General Albert Moses and his wife, Simone, have decided to make Montreal their home, having fallen in love with the city and especially its Jewish community.

Moses will complete his four-year term as envoy to eastern Canada in August and the couple has begun the process of applying for permanent residence. Moses, 60, who has been in the diplomatic service for more than 30 years, said he may accept one more assignment from his native country, but their intention is to settle in Montreal as soon as possible.

Moses made the surprise announcement at a "farewell" reception in his and his wife's honour, held by the Westmount Chabad Centre, where he davens regularly.

The couple describe themselves as being "neo-Orthodox," and have tried to maintain an observant life style throughout their numerous postings abroad.

Keeping a kosher home has been challenging in some locales. When sent to Ivory Coast, for example, they brought with them a supply of frozen kosher meat. To make things easier – their job, after all, does entail attending innumerable functions – they have become virtual vegetarians in recent years.

Moses, an Amsterdam native, has also served in Copenhagen; Hong Kong; Washington; London, England; Stockholm; Rabat, Morocco; and Australia. He was posted twice in The Hague, including immediately before coming to Montreal, when he helped lay the groundwork for the new International Criminal Court.

The Moseses, who grew up in non-religious families, became fascinated with the Chabad movement while living in London from 1987 to '91. "I like their openness – they are non-judgmental, non-prejudiced," said Moses in an interview.

He is especially captivated by Westmount Chabad because it attracts such a "remarkably eclectic" group of people, many of them professionals and academics. It's also a welcoming place for newcomers, thanks to director Rabbi Yossi Shanowitz and his wife, Deborah, he said.

Moses described being Jewish in Montreal as "a feeling of lightness" unlike other places he has lived where the outside world may be "indifferent or even inimical."

The plaque Moses was presented with from Chabad reads: "Your integration of a strong, proud and noble Jewish identity together with a distinguished diplomatic service is an inspiration to all."

They find community life in general here "vibrant," certainly compared to Holland. And they like Montreal for its diversity, culture and ambience. They had no prior connection to the city or Canada, and had regarded coming here as "just another posting, a career matter," and were pleasantly surprised.

Moses travels to the Atlantic provinces once or twice a year, and a letter of congratulations was sent to the Chabad affair by Nova Scotia's lieutenant-governor, Myra Freedman.

Moses' father escaped deportation during the Nazi occupation and fled in September 1943 to England, via a long overland trek to Spain. His mother was hidden in Holland. Like most Dutch, Moses, who was born in 1946, grew up keenly aware of the Canadians' role in the liberation of the country, and heard stories from his grateful grandparents of opening their homes to Canadian Jewish soldiers.

Moses said he entered the foreign service out of curiosity and because it's "a very nice way to see the world." Simone is a child psychologist by training, but has not had much chance to practise.

Moses' only family in Holland today is his mother. The country has about 11,000 Jews, and Moses is convinced Jewish life is, for all practical purposes, over in Holland. A growing Muslim population and the cultural clash that is developing over their integration is not a factor in the Moses' decision to leave the country, he insisted.

"There are tensions, and certainly there is a radical fringe, but it is not as bad as people think," he said.

Two of the Moseses' four children also plan to settle in Canada, their sons Meir and Benaiah, who are now in London, as is a third child. The fourth lives in Jerusalem. Meir and Benaiah will probably go to Vancouver. The Moseses have three grandchildren.

Moses considers a highlight of his tenure as consul general in Montreal to be last year's 60th anniversary of the liberation of Holland and the end of the war, which included a visit by Princess Margriet of the Netherlands and an exhibition on Anne Frank, among other events.

On June 12, Moses will be in New York to serve as honorary chair, along with the Dutch ambassador to the United Nations, of the 10th annual Spirit of Anne Frank Awards ceremony in New York. Each year, outstanding individuals are cited for contributing to combating racism and discrimination.

MITZVAH BRIGADE: Twenty five kids from Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am's bar/bat mitzvah program met one recent Sunday morning at the offices of Ve'ahavta to hear Avrum Rosensweig, Ve'ahavta's executive director and founder, speak about the homeless. Afterward, the children, assisted by parents and members of Ve'ahavta's Vaughan chapter, helped pack 150 tote bags for homeless clients and guests at the Ve'ahavta Second Seder at Congregation Habonim. The kids wrote notes of hope and inspiration to place in the bags.

TZEDAKAH EVENING: Yona Bernstein, left, Kayla Goldman, centre, and Sarah Turk, the heads of Ulpanat Orot's chesed committee, celebrate the success of the high school's recent Mother-Daughter evening. The annual event raised about $7,000 for the Aleh Foundation, an Israeli organization that helps children with learning and developmental challenges. [Rebecca Ansel photo]

Grafstein distributes world-class Israeli wines in Ontario

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The Grafstein family shares a passion for Israel and a passion for wine.

Owners of Grafstein Wines, Ontario wine distributors, they have one of the largest selection of high-quality Israeli wines in the world, "even in Israel," says Neil Grafstein, who started the firm – then known as the Sacramental Wine Company – in 1983, with his wife, Rachel.

Their daughter, Tovah, one of the couple's four children and currently a student in Israel, is now involved in the marketing of their products.

They take pride in their wine, which is highly rated in the wine world, says Grafstein.

He said that the editor of The Wine Spectator, a wine website, ordered two cases of Tabor Mescha, a dry, red, full-bodied wine, "and he had the choice of every wine in the world. It's a world-class wine, and we're the only exporter in the world to carry it.

"We were the first client of Tabor Winery in the upper Galilee, so they still allow us a small quantity for export."

The winery has grown grapes since 1901, he says, and they are all hand-picked. "The grapes are picked at 2 a.m. when it is still cool, and they are crushed within the hour. That is the secret."

Grape picking is a community event, he says. "Kids get together and pick."

They are also the exclusive agents for an organic grape juice produced on Kibbutz Sde Eliyahu.

"The grapes are grown on chemical-free earth, and then it is bottled in Jerusalem, again with no chemicals, and no sugar or water. It is 100 per cent grapes."

The family is partial to products grown on kibbutzim, says Grafstein, because the kibbutzniks dedicate their life to the land. "They're into quality, not quantity."

Tovah Grafstein says that they have seven new wines from Tzora Vineyard, north of Beit Shemesh.

"The quality of the grapes grown on Kibbutz Tzora is phenomenal. It is boutique winery, so the grapes are picked by hand and get hands-on care.

"It's a whole different way of making wine. The grapes are precious to them, so they make sure they're picked at exactly the right time."

Ronnie Jaimes picks grapes at Tzora winery.

Grafstein Wines are also exclusive agents for the Golan Heights Winery. Products at the LCBO, distributed by Grafstein's, include Golan Cabernet Sauvignon, Golan Emerald Riesling, Yarden Blanc de Blancs, Yarden Sauvignon Blanc, Yarden Mt. Hermon Red, Yarden Mt. Hermon White.

Other products at the LCBO, distributed by Grafstein's, include Yarden Cabernet Sauvignon, Hafner Welschriesling, Hafner Zweigelt, Hafner Ice Wine Chardonnay, Kleine Draken Sauvignon Blanc, Kleine Draken Pinotage, Nobile Prima Chianti.

The Grafsteins send along the following recipe:

FRUIT SABAYON

6 egg yolks
1 cup granulated sugar
1 cup Yarden Blanc de Blancs or Yarden Muscat wine
1 cup raspberries or 1 cup pomegranate seeds

With electric hand mixer, beat egg yolks with sugar until mixture is thick and creamy, about 7 to 10 minutes.

Place mixture in top of a double-boiler pan over gently simmering water. Whisking constantly, slowly pour in wine. Whisk until mixture is thick and frothy and triples its original volume, and is pale yellow in colour, about 5 to 8 minutes. Remove from heat.

Divide raspberries or pomegranate seeds into four serving cups, pour mixture on top. Serve immediately.

To prepare ahead: Refrigerate wine mixture. When ready to serve, fold in 1 cup heavy cream, whipped. Serve with fruit as above. Serves 2.

We missed the eggs!

The following is a corrected version of a recipe that appeared in The CJN March 23.

CONFETTI VEGETABLE KUGEL
From Healthy Helpings /MealLeaniYumm!

3 medium zucchini, unpeeled (1 lb.)
3 carrots, peeled
2 sweet potatoes or 3 large potatoes, peeled (about 1 lb.)
2 medium onions
2 cloves garlic
½ cup parsley leaves
3 to 4 tbsp. chopped fresh basil (or 1 tsp. dried)
4 eggs plus 4 egg whites (or 6 eggs)
½ cup potato starch or matzah meal
1¼ tsp. salt (to taste)
½ tsp. pepper (to taste)
2 tsp. olive oil

Preheat oven to 375. Grate zucchini, carrots and sweet potatoes. (Can be done in the food processor.) Finely mince onions, garlic, parsley and basil. Combine all ingredients in a large mixing bowl and mix well. Spray a 3-qt. rectangular or oval casserole with non-stick spray. Add vegetable mixture and spread evenly. Bake at 375 for 1 hour and 10 minutes, or until golden brown and firm. Makes 12 servings. Freezes and/or reheats well.

101 calories per serving, 2.7 g fat (0.7 g saturated), 71 mg cholesterol, 4 g protein, 15 g carbohydrate, 315 mg sodium, 280 mg potassium, <1 mg iron, 2 g fibre, 35 mg calcium.

Variations: Mixture can be baked in sprayed muffin tins at 37 for 25 to 30 minutes, until golden brown.

Recipe may be halved. Bake in a 1½-qt. greased casserole for 45 to 55 minutes.

Side dishes will complement the main course

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Side dishes help pull a meal together and can really enhance the Passover table. They add to and complement the other menu items, and are a welcome contribution for those who want to bring a dish to help the hostess.

Many years ago, my family used to get together with a few other families for a joint seder. I always offered to bring whatever no one else wanted to make, which was invariably the side dishes.

Many traditional Passover dishes – kugel, roasted potatoes or gefilte fish, for example – are delicious but give the Passover table a dull beige look. The side dishes can add colour and eye appeal. It also helps if the dishes can be prepared ahead and heated up at the last minute, or served cold.

CAULIFLOWER WITH AVOCADO SAUCE

1 large cauliflower or 2 small ones
1 small bottle Italian dressing
3 avocados salt, to taste
pepper, to taste

Remove leaves from cauliflower heads and cook the heads in boiling water until fork-tender yet still slightly crunchy. Cool in a colander under cold running water.

Place the cauliflower in a zip-top plastic bag, fill with bottled dressing and let marinate overnight.

Place cauliflower on a plate. Mash the avocado with enough of the marinade to make a spreading consistency. Taste and correct seasoning with salt and pepper. Spread avocado with a knife over the cauliflower. Makes 8 servings.

Break or cut cauliflower into florets to serve.

MARLENE SOROSKY'S ASPARAGUS WITH LEMON MATZAH SAUCE

4 lb. asparagus
¼ lb. butter or margarine
2 tbsp. plus 2 tsp. lemon juice
2 cloves garlic, peeled and crushed
4 tbsp. matzah meal (see note)
salt and pepper, to taste

Wash, trim and peel asparagus. (Pencil-thin spears do not need to be trimmed.)

Fill a large saute pan or skillet with water. Bring to a boil and add the asparagus. Simmer uncovered until asparagus are tender but firm. Timing will depend on the size and age of the asparagus and individual preference. Remove spears with tongs to a towel-lined tray. (If you cook the asparagus ahead, the spears should be refreshed in ice water before you place them on the towel-lined tray. Then place them in a microwave dish and reheat.)

To make sauce, melt the margarine or butter in a small saucepan. Stir in the lemon juice, garlic and matzah meal. Simmer gently or sauce will separate. Remove from heat. When ready to serve, reheat sauce and pour over hot asparagus. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

Note: Bread crumbs can be substituted for matzah meal at other times of year.

BUTTERNUT SQUASH STUFFED WITH TZIMMES

5 butternut squash (divided use)
4 large sweet potatoes
4 medium apples
7 to 8 oz. pitted prunes (about 24)
½ cup sweet red Passover wine or orange juice
½ cup water
about ½ cup white or brown sugar, or to taste
1½ tsp. ground cinnamon
½ tsp. ground ginger

To prepare squash shells, cut four of the squash in half lengthwise. Place face-down in a baking pan and pour ½ in. of water into the pan. Cover with foil and bake at 350 until squash is fork-tender yet firm enough to hold its shape. Time will vary from 30 to 60 minutes, depending on the size of the squash.

While squash is baking, grease a 9x13-in. baking dish. Peel the sweet potatoes and cut them into ¼-in. cubes. Do the same with the remaining butternut squash, discarding all seeds and fibres. Cut the apples into quarters and remove the seeds. Peel apples if desired, then coarsely chop them.

Put the sweet potatoes, squash and apples into a large bowl with the prunes. In a small bowl or glass measuring cup, combine the remaining ingredients. Pour the mixture over the fruit and vegetables and mix everything very well so all is coated with the liquid.

Turn the mixture into the prepared baking dish. Cover tightly with foil and bake at 375 for about 1 hour, or until the sweet potatoes and squash are tender. Stir the tzimmes before serving to evenly distribute the sauce and slightly mash the apples. Taste and add more sugar if needed.

Spoon some of the tzimmes into each squash shell. Serve any remaining tzimmes in a bowl. Makes 8 servings.

Israel deepens fight to thwart Hamas

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — Even before he formed Israel's new governing coalition, Prime Minister-elect Ehud Olmert was fighting a two-fisted campaign against Palestinian terrorism – military and political.

As representatives of Olmert's Kadima party opened formal talks with potential partners Sunday, Olmert convened top officials to decide on ways of increasing the international isolation of the new Palestinian Authority (PA) government under Hamas.

Israel cut ties with the PA after Hamas won the January elections in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. Furthermore, Israeli officials announced the country would shun foreign dignitaries who maintained ties with the radical Islamic group – a rebuff to Russia and China, countries that have already weakened U.S.-led isolation efforts by courting senior Hamas officials.

"We need to press the policy already in place and get the world to close ranks and understand that a terrorist government, even if it is democratically elected, is no interlocutor," Olmert confidant Ze'ev Boim told Israel Army Radio.

But Israel left the door open to potential diplomacy with PA President Mahmoud Abbas by not including him in the blacklist.

With international mediators complaining of an economic crisis in Gaza, Olmert also authorized the siphoning off of funds from withheld PA tax levies, in order to pay Israeli electricity and water companies to keep supplying the coastal strip.

On the ground in Gaza, matters were far from conciliatory. After months of mounting cross-border rocket barrages, Israel stepped up its military response over the weekend.

At least 17 Palestinians, most of them combatants, were killed by shelling from the air, sea and land.

The offensive prompted Islamic Jihad, the most violent Palestinian terrorist group since Hamas turned its attention to politics, to announce it was suspending rocket launches for a week. But the decision was reversed within hours.

With Olmert proposing to evacuate swaths of the West Bank as a follow-up to last year's Gaza Strip withdrawal, Israel believes it cannot afford to allow any spread of Palestinian terrorist tactics.

In what security sources called a blow to Palestinian capabilities in the West Bank, troops killed a top fugitive who was said to have set up a base in Bethlehem in a bid to import rocket-making techniques.

Olmert has emphasized that his "convergence plan" would bolster Israel's hold on major West Bank settlement blocs while evacuating more isolated and hard-to-defend enclaves.

"The idea is that most of the settlements that would have to be removed [will be] converged into the blocs of settlements that will remain under Israeli control," the prime minister-elect told Newsweek in his first interview with a foreign publication since winning last month's elections.

"The blocs of settlements, which include Ma'aleh Adumim, the Etzion bloc and Ariel, will be augmented by more settlements," Olmert added. "The rest of the territories will not have any Israeli presence and will allow territorial contiguity for a future Palestinian state."

Olmert said he would set Israel's border more or less along the route of the West Bank security fence, and seek U.S. endorsement for the move.

Ehud Olmert

"The time has come for a change, and I am absolutely determined to accomplish it. It's been discussed and debated and argued in Israel for decades. I think that there is an opportunity now which never existed before. This is a combination of the position of the public opinion of Israel, my commitment and the understanding and hopefully future support of President George W. Bush," Olmert told the magazine.

But with Kadima holding only 29 seats in the Knesset, Olmert needs a broad coalition.

The Labor party, which was the first to enter government-building talks with Kadima, looks likely to come aboard.

So does the Sephardi religious party Shas, which has tentatively backed territorial concessions to the Palestinians in the past.

Another party viewed as a coalition shoo-in is the Pensioners party, which focuses on the rights of senior citizens. Its leader, former spymaster Rafi Eitan, has voiced support for Kadima's diplomatic efforts.

The only wild card is the hawkish, immigrant-rights Yisrael Beiteinu under Avigdor Lieberman, who garnered a strong Knesset showing on the promise of rejecting any further unilateral withdrawals in the face of Palestinian violence.

But since the elections, Lieberman has assumed a more accommodating stance, allowing it to be known that Kadima's platform could be acceptable to Yisrael Beiteinu.

"We want permanent borders that are recognized by the international community. If this is within Olmert's platform, we will support it. If not, we won't be a partner," he told Israel's Channel 2 television Saturday.

Stopping Qassams may mean Gaza invasion

By YAAKOV KATZ
Jerusalem Post

Analysis

"This is a war," a high-ranking member of the Israel Defence Forces General Staff said Sunday. Not just a war against the Qassam, he explained, but a full-fledged war the State of Israel is waging against Palestinian terrorism.

But while the IDF has talked tough for months, issuing declarations every so often that it will "crack down" on Qassam launch cells, only over the weekend did the army really begin to put its fire where its mouth was. The results were evident – 15 Palestinians dead and dozens of others wounded.

The army, like any business enterprise, operates on the principles of cost-benefit analysis. In the current case, the equation is quite clear: the Qassam instills fear in the Negev, but it causes minimal damage, and so far not a single Israeli has been killed by the primitive rocket in a direct hit since disengagement some nine months ago.

On the other hand, senior officers say matter-of-factly, the IDF would definitely pay a heavy price with soldiers' lives were it to conduct a ground operation in Gaza.

With that formula in mind, IDF chief of staff Lt.-Gen. Dan Halutz is not rushing to enter Gaza and will continue doing everything possible from the air, sea and ground (outside Gaza) before he gives the invasion orders.

But other IDF officers say that "Southern Arrow" – the name of the IDF operation against the Qassams – is taking a natural course that will inevitably lead to a massive ground operation inside Gaza.

"We have no problem entering Gaza tomorrow," one high-ranking officer said. "It's all a matter of when we feel that we have fully utilized this current stage in the operation and we need to escalate our action to continue creating deterrence for the other side."

So while the army says it's satisfied overall with the IAF air strikes in Gaza over the weekend, officers predict the current intensification will last for a few weeks, after which another escalation or "step up" will be required – eventually culminating with troops on the ground in Jabalya and Khan Yunis.

That is exactly how the IDF's anti-Qassam campaign began. At first, the army set up artillery cannons that fired hundreds of shells a day at empty fields in northern Gaza. The next stage brought back targeted killings of Palestinians involved in the manufacture, deployment and launching of the rockets. The third stage, which began over the weekend, was the bombing of terror training camps in Gaza and the integration of navy warships in the daily barrages.

The army also didn't take seriously Islamic Jihad's reported offer of a cease-fire on Sunday in exchange for a halt to the IDF operation. Islamic Jihad, officials explained, is not a movement that Israel is open to negotiating with. The people who are really responsible for the Qassam fire, they said, are Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and his new Hamas-led government.

But the Qassams might turn out to be the least of the IDF's problems in Gaza. While only one Katyusha rocket has been fired at Israel so far (on election day), military intelligence believes the Palestinians have at least 100 more.

In addition, the army suspects Palestinians may have also gotten their hands on anti-aircraft missiles and other new weaponry. Iranian and Syrian terror and bomb experts, officers say, have also entered Gaza through the Rafah crossing with Egypt and are setting up new terror cells with the goal of duplicating them in the West Bank.

So while the army for now might be comfortable watching the Qassams take flight from outside Gaza, Halutz may soon need to order troops into the territory to curb the terror flow and stop the rocket fire once and for all.

Scandal threatens top rabbi

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — With scandal threatening the tenure of one of the top rabbis, some Israelis are asking whether Israel's Chief Rabbinate is needed.

In a move unprecedented in the Jewish state, Attorney General Menachem Mazuz issued a public call last week for the Ashkenazi chief rabbi, Yona Metzger, to resign.

Mazuz, an anti-corruption crusader, cited suggestions that Rabbi Metzger illicitly accepted discounted rates for himself and his family at a luxury Jerusalem hotel during High Holy Days in 2003 and 2004. He is also accused of staying at hotels at the taxpayers' expense despite having been provided with an apartment by the state.

"It would be appropriate if Rabbi Metzger took personal responsibility and decided on his own to step down," the Justice Ministry said in a six-page statement.

Rabbi Metzger, 52, denied wrongdoing and vowed to petition the High Court of Justice against Mazuz.

"The attorney general has sentenced me without giving me a chance to defend myself," Channel 2 television quoted Rabbi Metzger as saying.

A police probe against Rabbi Metzger did not come up with enough evidence for formal charges.

There is already plenty of irritation with the Chief Rabbinate, a government-backed institution that many believe has little relevance.

Secular Jews in Israel turn to local rabbinates for Orthodox services, while more religious Jews generally have their own community sages to turn to.

After the secular Shinui Party had the Religious Affairs Ministry dismantled under Israel's previous government, many now wonder if the Chief Rabbinate should be next.

"The rabbinate is entirely superfluous," said Nitzan Chen, religion reporter for Channel 1 television. "The post has no impact in terms of Jewish law or spiritual authority."

Rabbi Metzger's Sephardi counterpart, Rabbi Shlomo Amar, has already lost much of the public's trust. His son was jailed in January for kidnapping and assaulting his sister's suitor. Rabbi Amar himself was not charged in the case, but the apparent involvement of his wife, and the fact that the attack took place in the rabbi's home, are widely remembered.

Mazuz has said that if Rabbi Metzger does not resign of his own accord, the Justice Ministry will act to have him removed.

Olmert to form government

Ehud Olmert has been asked to form Israel's next government. The interim prime minister, whose centrist Kadima Party won last month's general election, was formally asked last week by President Moshe Katsav to construct a coalition. That cleared the way for Olmert to negotiate with other parties. "I hope to form a government with the broadest possible support as quickly as possible," Olmert told reporters. By law, he has six weeks to secure a coalition, but a deal could be in place within days.

Sharon undergoes surgery

Ariel Sharon underwent surgery to reattach a piece of his skull that had been removed in previous surgeries. Jerusalem's Hadassah Hospital in Ein Kerem reported the comatose Israeli prime minister was in stable condition. He remains in a coma from his Jan. 4 stroke. The skull fragment had been removed following Sharon's stroke due to the swelling resulting from the stroke. The decision to operate resulted from a lack of signs of improvement on any front. "Given the fact that there hasn't been an improvement in quite a long time," a hospital official said, the surgery was "something that might have [led] to a more favourable condition." No immediate improvement in Sharon's condition was reported.

Pope may visit Israel

Pope Benedict XVI may visit Israel early next year, former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres said. The longtime Israeli politician made the comments last week after meeting with the Pope at the Vatican. Peres was repeating an invitation issued by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon last year.

'Mini-tornado' hits Israel

A "mini-tornado" tore through northern Israel on April 4. The twister, a phenomenon almost unheard of in the Mideast, caused major damage in several Galilee villages. Up to 200 Israelis were lightly hurt by debris.

Turkish water deal frozen

Israel froze plans to import Turkish water. Israeli officials said the 2004 deal with Ankara, under which 1.75 million cubic feet of water was to have been shipped annually, was shelved due to high fuel costs. As an alternative, a water pipeline may be laid from Turkey to Israel. Pressure for a deal has been alleviated as a drought Israel experienced in the early 2000s is largely over.

Israeli bank cuts ties

Israel's largest bank severed ties with Palestinian banks. Bank Hapoalim, the main Israeli bank dealing with the Palestinian Authority, shut down all ties, citing international laws criminalizing dealings with terrorists. The Bank Hapoalim move could herald other private sector cutoffs for the Palestinians. Officials at the Arab Bank in Jordan, which handles some PA business, are considering their next move.

Drug makers target Israel

Some U.S. drug companies want Israel to be kept out of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development. The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, which made the request in writing to the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative, says Israel doesn't give adequate intellectual property protection to U.S. pharmaceutical firms operating there. Joining the OECD is a key Israeli foreign policy goal. Last November, the U.S. Congress passed a nonbinding resolution backing Israeli membership in the OECD.

Pesach food for the needy

Passover food has been distributed to needy Jews in Israel. The Claims Conference, together with the Humanitarian Fund of the International Commission on Holocaust Era Insurance Claims, began distributing Passover food packages to more than 12,000 needy Nazi victims in Israel. The distribution was co-ordinated by the Ministry of Welfare and Employment. The basic package includes matzah, wine, fruits and vegetables, oil, chicken and fish. More than $540,000 (US) was allocated by the Claims Conference and ICHEIC for the food.

WE MUST STOP THE HUGE LOSS OF JEWS!

In the Diaspora - we lose more than 200 Jews per day to inter-marriage and assimilation.
In the last year alone, the Jewish world lost more than 73,000 souls exclusively to these reasons and the numbers perpetually escalate.
In the past 35 years we have lost 2.25 million Jews forever to these same causes.
In the next 50 years, we will lose another 1/3 of world Jewry ... more than 4 million people.

The most critical issue facing Judaism since the Holocaust!

In 2004, the 'Jewish People Policy Planning Institute' in Jerusalem, comprised of the world's leading Jewish demographers, released their latest findings in a 672 page report called 'Between Thriving and Decline'. It was the most comprehensive study ever undertaken of all world Jewry. They conclude that in the absence of new and innovative concepts, "the future of the Jewish people is in doubt". Updated 2005 edition figures show a further 17% increase of inter-marriage and assimilation.

All Currently existing Jewish programs (education, sponsored trips to Israel, building projects etc.) are having minimal effect to change this massive decline.

This continual loss of Jews will not stop unless...."New concepts are initiated"

Who will create the future generations?

Jewish Singles planning is the most ignored area in all Jewish communities.

Regular and effective programming, activities, interest groups and events for Jewish singles are virtually non-existent. This lack of attention by Jewish communities is rapidly pushing them away from Judaism and in turn their affinity to Israel. This was the main theme being addressed at the General Assembly in Toronto, in November 2005.

We must do everything possible to fulfill the collective needs of Jewish singles, to gain their interest and keep them interested, in their people and their culture.

Jewish Singles World – A non-profit community program – Has the Power to do it.

This essential project must be funded for the future survival of Judaism

We must act now...Before it is too late!

Tehran Jews insist there's Jewish future in Iran

By LEV KRICHEVSKY
JTA

MOSCOW — Russian Jewish organizers of a trip earlier this month for 15 Iranian Jewish women in Russia said they hope it will lead to links between the two communities.

"We have not had any contacts with Iranian Jews," said Adolph Shayevich, one of Russia's two chief rabbis. "We have heard various rumours lately that there is no Jewish community in Iran, that things are bad for Jews there. We are happy to see it for ourselves that this isn't the whole truth."

The group is a 15-member women's amateur folk dance group that came to Moscow this month to take part in the Light a Candle Jewish children's arts festival.

The trip was a rare group visit abroad by Iranian Jews, who live in an Islamic country virulently opposed to the State of Israel – and they visited Russia, where Jews lived under tight restrictions until the fall of Communism.

The Iranians, aged 14 to 30, came to Russia thanks to diplomatic efforts by Arkady Gaidamak, a Russian Jewish leader and businessman, and with a special permit from Iranian authorities.

Russia is a major supplier of nuclear technology to Iran, which is under strong international pressure to halt its alleged nuclear weapons program.

In addition to general tourist sites, the delegation visited a synagogue and a Jewish day school in Moscow, as well as the Jewish community of Yaroslavl.

The women were expected to be joined by Harun Yeshayaie, the chairman of the Iranian Jewish community, but he had to cancel his visit at the last minute because of health reasons, according to members of the delegation.

All the members of the group live in the capital of Tehran, which is home to 15,000 Jews, the majority of the estimated 25,000 Jews who still live in the Islamic Republic.

This is only a fraction of the 100,000-strong community that lived in Iran before the 1979 Islamic Revolution.

But the Jewish women who visited Russia said the community has a future in Iran, despite the militant anti-Zionism of Tehran's current political regime.

"After the revolution, problems began for the community," said Elham Abaei, 30, the leader of the group that came to Russia.

Abaei, who runs the Iranian Jewish community's website, www.iranjewish.com, said the community has adjusted to the political and social climate.

"We can now run cultural and religious, but not political, activities," she said, referring to anything related to Israel.

Opposition to the Jewish state has been a cornerstone of the Islamic revolution. In 1999, 13 Jews were accused of spying for Israel. Ten eventually served jail terms, with the last being released in 2002.

Most recently, Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, caused a wave of international condemnation when he suggested Israel should be wiped off the map and called the Holocaust a myth.

The statement about the Holocaust reportedly triggered a rare example of discontent from Iran's Jewish leadership. Yeshayaie, the community's chairman, wrote a letter to Ahmadinejad that said the remarks caused fear in the country's Jewish community.

But on the issue of Israel, these Iranian Jews would not speak out against Tehran's official policy.

"You can be Jewish and not associate yourself with Israel," said Sarah Hay, a 21-year-old computer engineering student from Tehran.

Even far away from Iran, members of the group tried to distance themselves from any reference to Israel when visiting Russian Jewish institutions.

In Yaroslavl, a city in central Russia, the local community baked two cakes for the Iranians. But group members were visibly shocked when they saw the cakes were glazed with the design of the Israeli flag. Their hosts only served them cake without the flag design.

But a member of the delegation who asked not to be identified due to fear of repression back home said she had been to the Jewish state, visiting her family there. She added that she was not unique.

Some Jews use their foreign travels to meet with their Israeli relatives in a third country, usually Turkey or western Europe.

The members of the group said they were participants in the cultural activities of the Tehran Jewish community.

The communal activities range from day schools – half of Tehran's Jewish children are said to attend Jewish day schools – to synagogues, youth clubs and summer camps, and even a Jewish hospital in Tehran.

One of the members of the group described her community as having "everything a Jewish community should have," except for an Israeli connection.

Iranian Jews are an officially recognized minority and are generally free from discrimination – although all women in Iran, regardless of their faith, must cover their faces in public.

Privately, some women said it's impossible for Jews to enter some sectors of the government, but they said they don't want to leave Iran.

"We are Iranians first. We share our country's history," Hay said.

Abaei said her parents are too old to leave, and generally those who stay in Iran after all these years feel comfortable there. "There are no ghettos. You can live your life," she added.

She said some Jews "were slightly offended" by the Iranian president's remarks about the Holocaust.

But years of state-run propaganda show themselves in the Jewish community members. Abaei said some Jews may disagree that the Holocaust was a myth, yet they are inclined to think the number of Jewish Nazi victims may be "an exaggeration."

The main problem the community has, she said, was lack of rabbis and teachers of Judaism. There are no yeshivot in Iran, and only one ordained rabbi is serving a Tehran community that has 16 active synagogues.

A Moscow Jewish leader said the Russian community should take advantage of Moscow's good relations with Tehran to benefit Iran's Jews.

"Maybe we can invite a group of Iranian Jewish boys to study in a Moscow yeshiva," said Pinchas Goldschmidt, Moscow's chief rabbi.

HOLOCAUST COMPENSATION PAYMENT DEADLINE

The following is a summary of an Announcement for certain persons who made an application to the Claims Conference's Program for Former Slave and Forced Laborers. Additional information can be found at www.claimscon.org

The last day that payments from the German Foundation, "Remembrance, Responsibility, and the Future," may be made to eligible Holocaust survivors and heirs of survivors, according to the German Foundation law, is September 30, 2006.

No new applications for payments from the German Foundation can be made. Only claims filed before the deadline that remain open are being processed.

You must contact the Claims Conference if you are a Holocaust survivor, or heir of a survivor, who submitted a timely application to the Program for Former Slave and Forced Laborers and:

- have been approved for payment, but have not received the full payment, OR
- have not received notification about the status of the claim, OR
- have received an Heir Application Packet and have not yet returned the required forms.

If a person eligible for payment dies, heirs of the deceased person must notify the Claims Conference within six months of the death of the eligible person or by September 30, 2006, whichever is sooner, in order to receive payment

All time limits related to appeals and to heirs that have not expired as of September 30, 2006, terminate on that date

All communications to the Claims Conference described above (other than as regards appeals or heir deadline notification) must be postmarked by May 15, 2006 and must arrive at the Claims Conference no later than June 1, 2006

These deadlines also apply to the German Foundation Fund for Medical Experiments and Other Personal Injuries

The US Court supervising the Swiss Banks Settlement Slave Labor Class I has adopted the administrative deadlines of the German Foundation. Please note: In any case where the result of a timely appeal for a payment was negative but documentary proof of eligibility was located by the applicant subsequent to the appeal decision, it may become possible to review the earlier decision. Applicants must contact the Claims Conference Appeals Office in communication postmarked by May 15, 2006 and that communication must arrive at the Claims Conference Appeals Office no later than June 1, 2006. Please keep written proof of the date of mailing, fax or email communication

NO NEW APPLICATIONS CAN BE MADE.

SOPHIA LOREN IN TEL AVIV

The Italian film superstar Sophia Loren arrived in Israel Sunday to participate in the birthday celebrations of her longtime friend maestro Zubin Mehta. Mehta, who is the musical director of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, will be 70 on April 29. Loren, 71, was greeted with much enthusiasm as she entered the foyer of her Tel Aviv hotel. She is no stranger to Israel. Apart from having made a number of films there, she has many friends in the country.

Assessing motives of Muslim, Jewish and Christian terrorists

Terror in the Name of God by Jessica Stern, HarperCollins.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Be they Muslims, Christians or Jews, terrorists invariably kill, maim and wreak havoc out of a deep sense of religious conviction.

This phenomenon interests Jessica Stern, a lecturer at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government. In her illuminating book, Terror in the Name of God, now available in a new paperback edition published by HarperCollins, she analyzes the motives of individuals who have plotted murder and mayhem to achieve their objectives.

Before introducing a reader to her cast of variegated characters, whom she interviewed in field trips, Stern wisely defines her terms.

Religious terrorists tend to feel pain, loss and impatience, and are trying to find a clear purpose in what is manifestly a confusing world. They see problems in black and white.

Particularly in the case of Muslims, they are usually recruited from extremist religious seminaries. Their mentors and/or teachers hold out the promise of heavenly rewards.

Some terrorists become involved for adventure or friendship. Still others consider guns and violence appealing. But for all of them, martyrdom – the supreme act of heroism and worship – provides the ultimate escape from life's dilemmas and alienation, humiliation, anger and confusion.

The Palestinians, Stern observes, are engulfed in "an epidemic of despair." Fleshing out her thesis, she visits Hamas officials in the Gaza Strip after Hamas functionaries in Jordan refuse to meet her because she is Jewish.

Gaza is revolting. "The sidewalks are uneven and covered with garbage," she writes. "Mingled smells of sewage, sweat, spices and rotting meat – assault us as we walk."

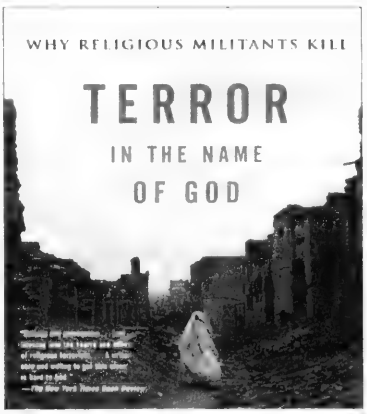
Recognizing that poverty and hopelessness among ordinary Palestinians are factors accounting for its popularity, Hamas enhances its appeal by providing essential social and medical services and harping on the corruption rife in the Palestinian Authority.

(No wonder Hamas defeated Fatah in recent parliamentary elections and went on to form a government in Gaza and the West Bank).

Stern discovers that social pressure induces young Palestinians to become terrorists. She learns that the typical suicide bomber is mentally immature, cannot find a job, feels lost, seeks refuge in God and attends mosque.

Eerily enough, death notices for suicide bombers often take the form of wedding announcements. Life and death are thus conflated.

Expecting to be soothed and comforted by black-eyed virgins once they reach heaven, some of the bombers wrap protective toilet paper around their genitals prior to undertaking a mission.



JESSICA STERN

Stern, in her analysis of Jewish extremists, focuses on those who have attempted to bomb Muslim holy sites. Their radicalism stems from a belief that the land Israel captured in the Six Day War cannot be relinquished under any circumstances.

As Stern puts it: "The biblical promise of Eretz Israel... to God's chosen people makes the concept of land a key component of religious doctrine to fundamentalist Jews, who believe that possession of the land... is part and parcel of the Jews' covenant with God."

One of her interlocutors, Yoel Lerner, says, "It begins with the assumption that nobody – from the individual Jew up to the most powerful government you could imagine – has the moral right to give up any significant territory making up part of the Land of Israel."

Justifying former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin's assassination by Bar-Ilan University student Yigal Amir, Lerner claims that his death "was coming" and "had to come."

Carmi Gillon, the head of the Shin Bet, Israel's internal security service, under Rabin, argues that the radical right poses a grave threat to Israel's national security. Much like Hamas, he claims, Jewish extremists use a selective reading of history as a powerful tool for mobilizing members.

In her discussion of Christian fundamentalists, Stern focuses on Kerry Noble, a Protestant pastor and lapsed neo-Nazi who regrets his involvement in a dangerous American cult known as the Covenant, the Sword and the Arm of the Lord (CSA).

Downright anti-Semitic, CSA believes that humanists, Communists, socialists and Zionists have taken over the U.S. government and created a monster it refers to as ZOG ("Zionist-occupied government").

White supremacists of this ilk applaud Al Qaeda's goals and actions, and may eventually link up with Islamic radicals, she warns.

Writing of jihadists in Pakistan who fight in Kashmir, Stern says that religious fervour is but only one of the reasons why their ranks are filled by new recruits.

Financial inducements, in the form of cash bonuses for recruiters and trainers, are of the utmost importance in organizations like Harkat-ul-Mujahideen and Hizb-ul-Mujahideen. Stern cites the case of a foreign-languages teacher who was paid twice as much by one of these groups as compared to his own school.

Status in the community plays a role, too. "One becomes important due to his work," a trainer told Stern. "Successful operations make a militant famous and glamorous among his fellow men."

Her visit to a madrassah, or religious seminary, sheds further light.

"I am allowed to wander around and speak with the students," she writes. "The students sit on the floor, their Korans and their elbows resting on long, narrow tables. Twenty students at each table sway as they recite the words of the Holy Korans."

Speaking to a 12-year-old boy whose secular education ended in the fifth grade, she asks what he wants to do when he grows up. "He tells me he wants to be a mujaheed, to kill the non-Muslims who are oppressing Muslims."

By Stern's reckoning, 70,000 to 110,000 Muslims had graduated from Osama bin Laden's training camps in Afghanistan by Sept. 11, 2001. She identifies other Al Qaeda camps as having been in Yemen, Somalia, Indonesia and Chechnya. Recruits are steeped not only in the military arts, but in Islamic doctrine.

The terrorist groups under Stern's purview are convinced that they are creating a more perfect world – purifying the universe of injustice and cruelty.

Anti-Americanism has gained ground in their circles due to U.S. support for Israel and the presence of repressive regimes in the Middle East, she notes.

Stern believes that terrorism should be countered not just with guns, but by psychological warfare. "In the end, however, what counts is what we fight for, not what we oppose. We need to avoid giving into spiritual dread, and to hold fast to the best of our principles, by emphasizing tolerance, empathy and courage."

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

PETRA, LOST CITY OF STONE, HIGHLIGHTED IN OTTAWA-AREA EXHIBIT

The Swiss explorer John Lewis Burckhardt made a rather momentous discovery while travelling in the Transjordan region in 1812. Coming within range of the spot where the biblical Aaron was allegedly buried on Mount Hor, and having heard tales of a lost city in the vicinity, he told the local Bedouin he wanted to sacrifice a lamb and this was his motive for entering the area. The ruse allowed him to become the first European to visit Petra, the legendary lost city of stone.

Because of the vast hoards of hidden treasure it was wrongly supposed to contain, Petra was long off-limits to outsiders. Burckhardt was threatened with a firearm; Henry Layard, discoverer of Nineveh, was robbed by nearby villagers in 1840. As orientalist Charles M. Doughty observed in 1888, travellers "commonly lament the robber violence" that was prevalent in the region.

Petra was still considered off the beaten path when I rode on horseback through its famous rocky canyon in 1988. A decade later, after a fresh peace had been struck with Israel, I returned to find that the Jordanians had pumped millions of dollars into the tourist infrastructure and pressed a fleet of motorized carts into operation.

Petra's sinuous canyon, known as the Siq, winds for several kilometres before opening onto El Khazhan Faroun, the Treasury of the Pharoahs, a spectacular two-story façade carved into the rock. The ancient Nabateans carved thousands of tombs, temples and dwellings within this stronghold, which the Romans nonetheless conquered in 106 CE, making it the hub of their province of Arabia Petrae.

A new exhibition at the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Hull, Quebec, (across the river from Ottawa), recalls this fascinating archeological wonder carved into the red sandstore cliffs of the Jordanian desert. "Petra: Lost City of Stone," which opened last week, highlights the city and its ancient inhabitants through display of 170 artifacts such as sculptures and reliefs, ceramics and metalwork.

The travelling exhibition is on view until Jan. 2, 2007. Admission is $15. For details, phone 819-776-7000 or visit the website www.civilization.ca

An exhibition that opened last week at Cleveland's Maltz Museum of Jewish Heritage marks the first time various biblical-era artifacts from Israel have been shown in North America. Included is the Temple Scroll, one of the most important Dead Sea Scrolls.

Curated by the Israel Museum, "Cradle of Christianity: Treasures from the Holy Land" also includes the burial ossuary of Caiaphas the High Priest, an inscription bearing the name of Pontius Pilate, evidence of an actual crucifixion, a graffito of a menorah, and a stone inscription from the Temple Mount, reading: "To the place of trumpeting."

The exhibition explores aspects of early Jewish life and the concurrent birth of Christianity in the final days of the Second Temple era and from the 4th to 7th centuries CE. It remains on view until Oct. 22 and subsequently travels to two more museums, as yet unnamed. 216-593-0575, www.MaltzJewishMuseum.org

Lawyer writes lyrics for a song with hit potential

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It's not every day you come across a a wills lawyer who writes song lyrics and scripts, and is just as concerned with mending broken families as he is with splitting up their inheritances.

Les Kotzer, a Toronto-area wills and estates lawyer, said that in all his years of practising law, he has witnessed too many families fighting over inheritance and hopes that through the lyrics he has written, and the movie script he hopes to write, families can learn to communicate better with one another.

"I'm seeing a lot of fighting over money – baby boomers fighting after the death of their parents. So my partner [Barry Fish] and I originally wrote a book called The Family Fight: Planning to Avoid It."

Kotzer, 50, said he is proud of the book that was featured in the New York Times, as well as other North American media outlets, but added that he is passionate about writing song lyrics and scriptwriting.

"The songwriting part of my life really started to take off in the last couple of years. After my mom died, I basically closed my practice down for a little bit and started writing and I wrote for love."

Kotzer, who is regularly invited to speak about families fighting over inheritance on Citytv's Breakfast Television and Rogers' Money Line, said that during his time off in 2001, he wrote a book of lyrics.

But it wasn't until he met Canadian musician and composer Lewis Manne, who wrote the theme music for television programs such as Degrassi Junior High, W-Five and Studio 2 with his partner Wendy Watson, that the idea to put music to his lyrics was born.

"Through bashert, we met, and Lewis fell in love with my lyrics, and what we liked about it was that today, you don't find a lot of songs that touch you. I write about family, about love, with messages in the lyrics," Kotzer said.

Manne wrote the music and sang the first song Kotzer wrote, Photos in a Drawer.

Manne wasn't the only Canadian icon who encouraged Kotzer to turn his lyrics into music. Alan Frew, lead singer of Juno-winning, Grammy-nominated 1980s rock band Glass Tiger gave his lyrics "rave reviews."

"Alan Frew came into my office, and having him here, I said, 'Would you mind reading my stuff?'"

"He read my lyric book, and he said, 'You have some really great lyrics here.' Now that he has heard the music, he just loves the song. For me, to have a Canadian icon say that is a dream."

Frew seemed confident that the songs Kotzer has written are going to bring him success in the world of pop music.

"Les has done a wonderful job. He never ceases to amaze me. He is an internationally renowned lawyer and now he's going to be a pop star as well," Frew said.

After Photos in a Drawer – a song inspired by and dedicated to his late mother – got airplay on FOXY 88.5 FM in Toronto, Kotzer was stunned by the reaction he got from listeners and by the popularity of the song.

"I get a tremendous response and it means a lot to me. I wasn't trained as a songwriter. It came naturally to me. To be able to touch people through music, means a lot to me, to my life, in terms of being a lawyer."

Kotzer said that after doing an interview with a San Francisco radio station, after which they played Photos in a Drawer, he received hundreds of phone calls.

"One woman said she had pulled over to the side of the road because I had touched her so much with that song. She called me her emotional lawyer and said I had touched an emotion that no one had ever touched before. She said she wanted to call her sibling who she hadn't spoken to for a long time," Kotzer recalled.

Despite the local popularity of the track currently sung by Manne, Kotzer said he has yet to find the person who can take this song to a national audience.

"We haven't found the person yet to who really wants to take this nationally. It's really more local, but we've been told by a number of people that this is a hit waiting to happen with the right person singing it," he said.

His newest track, These Are Our Heroes, which can be heard on 88.5 FM, and can be downloaded through his website www.familyfight.com, is about "the people in our lives who we've admired who are not here anymore," Kotzer said.

As if settling familial disputes and writing inspirational music was not time-consuming enough for a busy wills lawyer, Kotzer is also in the midst of writing a script for a movie based on what he sees in his practice.

"I have a script about two people fighting over their mother's assets. I have spoken to people in the industry and they really love my story," he said, adding that he is looking for someone to work with on the project.

Regardless of whether his songs or screenplay propel him into stardom, Kotzer said he will never turn his back on his practice and on helping people rebuild relationships with their families.

"I love law. I am passionate about my practice. I am passionate about wills and estates, but I'm always trying to encourage people to talk to their family before hiring me to talk to their family. I believe in family."

Although Kotzer won't let himself get caught up in the lure of the music business or in Hollywood, he still fantasizes about accepting an award in his mother's honour.

"My mother always said her greatest assets were not in her bank. Her greatest assets were in pictures, in the faces of her children. That is why I did this. To honour my mother," he said.

"One day, I'd love to be able to stand on a stage and say I wrote that song for my mom. That I did it for her."

Engaging documentary criticizes Gaza pullout

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

During last summer's Gaza disengagement, many on the Israeli left surprisingly opposed Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's pullout plan.

Although traditionally supporters of the land-for-peace argument, they felt the way the disengagement was handled violated basic human rights.

This is the premise of confrontational Canadian filmmaker Igal Hecht's latest documentary, Disengaging Democracy.

The documentary follows the pullout from Gush Katif, a 30-year-old settlement of 8,000 Israelis in the Gaza Strip, before, during and after the unilateral withdrawal.

Although the pullout was ratified by the Knesset, it was a "dictatorial decision" one of the settlers says. Critics say Sharon's decision was a 180-degree turnaround from his traditional policy and his dismissal of key cabinet ministers was a ploy to stuff the Knesset with supporters of his policy. "It might be kosher, but it stinks," another settler says.

Hecht and his co-producer Talia Klein of Chutzpa Productions – whose previous films include Not In My Name and Y.I.D. – are fast becoming veterans of the "in-your-face" confrontational documentary style.

An IDF soldier removes a settler and her daughter.

Scenes include one of Israel Defence Forces soldiers chainsawing through the settlement's gate as it falls with a resounding clang, and one of soldiers stopping busloads of protesters on their way to a demonstration. Another scene focuses on a harmless little girl as the narrator recounts how scores of soldiers had been called in to put down a potentially violent protest.

Hecht clearly knows how to make his point.

Although the documentary is strongly anti-Sharon, it rarely criticizes IDF soldiers, who were merely doing their job. Even the settlers accept this as they're being dragged out of their homes.

Hecht, always able to find emotional scenes amid the chaos, shows a female solder playing with a little girl settler. Another poignant scene is of a rabbi being led out of a synagogue in tears as he carries out the Torah scroll.

Sometimes criticized for being unbalanced in his films, Hecht interviews Rabbi Michael Melchior, a Labor MK and cabinet minister in Sharon's government, as the sole defender of the Gaza disengagement in the film.

"A democracy has the right and obligation to defend itself," Rabbi Melchior says. "Overall, [the pullout] was done democratically."

He added that he feels strongly that the opposition "plays strongly into the hands of the haters of Israel," by comparing the withdrawal to the Holocaust.

'It might be kosher but it stinks'

One of the film's arguments is that little thought was put into the aftermath of the pullout. Five months after the disengagement, we see many settlers living in tents and in what one settler calls "a mobile shanty town."

But whether the disengagement was right or wrong, even Hecht should admit that being able to film this documentary with little or no apparent government interference is not a sign of an anti-democratic state.

Like Chutzpa Productions' other films, Disengaging Democracy is well worth watching. It's an engaging documentary that sets us up for the possibility of a new battle in Israel's future, one in which the conflict is not between right and left but between religious and secular Jews.

Disengaging Democracy premieres April 18 on the digital i-channel (197 on Rogers, 514 on Bell ExpressVu). Further screenings are planned for the summer and in the fall on the CTS show Israel Today.

TORONTO'S 'INDIANA JONES' DECODES THE EXODUS IN TV DOCUMENTARY

Toronto filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici, in conjunction with Ontario-born film producer James ("Titanic") Cameron, has produced a slick new two-hour television documentary about the biblical Exodus that has more offbeat theories than The Da Vinci Code and more wizardry than anything you've ever seen in Harry Potter.

The Exodus Decoded, which is scheduled for viewing on the Discovery Channel on April 16 at 8 p.m., would probably make international headlines if even one of its many sensational claims could be certified as scientific fact.

Emmy award-winning Jacobovici, whose productions have included Deadly Currents (1991), Hollywoodism Jews, Movies & the American Dream (1997) and Quest for the Lost Tribes (1999), enacts his favourite on-screen persona as a filmmaker-detective-archeologist on a mystery quest – a sort of reconstituted Indiana Jones from Raiders of the Lost Ark.

This image of Hebrew slaves, and this 3,500-year-old artifact supposedly depicting the ark of the covenant with the altar in background, are some of the evidence presented in The Exodus Decoded.

Seeking physical traces of the biblical Exodus narrative is a difficult task, of course, mainly because the trail has grown rather cold after some 3½ millennia. But imagine Jacobivici and crew going where so many others have gone before and claiming astonishing discoveries at almost every turn.

He manages to turn up the mummified remains of the hard-hearted Pharoah of the Exodus; a hieroglyphic inscription telling the story from the Egyptian point of view; a signet ring once worn by the biblical Joseph; and for the glittering finale, a 3,500-year-old golden image of the lost ark. It's great theatre, if not great science

"Until now, most experts have contended that there is not a single archeological artifact supporting the story of the Exodus," Jacobovici said. "The truth is, that authenticated archeological artifacts have been gathering dust in the basements of various museums around the world.

"What we were able to do was juxtapose the biblical tradition with the Egyptian dynastic list and geological evidence to come up with a new date for the Exodus and a new Pharoah. Once we established that, the archeological heavens opened up."

The Exodus Decoded also shows us where the true Mount Sinai has been all these years and hypothesizes that the 10 plagues and the parting of the Red Sea were the result of natural calamities following a massive volcanic eruption on the Mediterranean island of Santorini.

The usual talking heads, so common in old-fashioned documentaries, have been banned from this film. Instead the storyline progresses through a multitude of marvellous high-tech computer simulations that seem to offer a three-dimensional representation of cyberspace. "Visually, it's The Matrix meets Biblical archaeology," Cameron jokes.

Three years in the making, the 90-minute documentary (two hours including commercials) is very well made, with many outstanding special effects along with its smoke and mirrors. If you have an interest in the subject, it's certainly guaranteed to challenge your assumptions and get you thinking.

Jacobovici, whose company is called Associated Producers, has signed a deal with St. Martin's Press in the United States and Key Porter in Canada to present his "groundbreaking discoveries" as a book.

Depression more common than you think, panel told

Once considered 'a terrible, dirty, vicious secret'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

By 2020, depression will be the No. 2 cause of disability worldwide, says a professor of psychiatry at University of Toronto.

It is far more common than most people realize, Dr. David Goldbloom, who is also a senior medical adviser at the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health (CAMH), told a recent panel discussion sponsored by Beth Tikvah Sisterhood.

"The reality is that no one can stand up and say 'It's not in my family,'" Goldbloom said.

Also on the panel was Karen Liberman, executive director of the Mood Disorders Association of Ontario, who spoke about her struggle and eventual recovery from depression.

Goldbloom said that a survey of 30,000 Canadians showed that in the 12 previous months, about five per cent were diagnosed with depression. "One in five women and one in 10 men will be diagnosed in their lifetime.

"[Those in the biggest risk group] are between 15 and 24, and this age also has the biggest suicide risk."

Included among a great number of public figures who have suffered from depression, he said, are Abraham Lincoln and Winston Churchill.

A cognitive disorder as much as a mood-related one, depression can attack and erode skills and capacities.

"The personal costs are beyond measure," Goldbloom said.

"Depression causes a profound loss of pleasure. Sleeping [suffers], energy is sapped, sexual drive plummets, the ability to concentrate goes, and making decisions becomes impossible."

People who are depressed carry a double burden, he said.

"As well as the symptoms, they carry the stigma of being depressed."

And those who appear well off carry a triple burden, he said. "People want to know how they can be depressed when their life is going so well."

Liberman said she was eight years old when her mother began getting depressed. "There was no cataclysmic event, but slowly something started happening to her. She just started fading away."

Her mother attempted suicide three times, Liberman said, and she found her on two of those occasions.

What she remembers clearly about those years, she said, was that no one talked about what was happening. "I learned that it was a terrible, dirty, vicious secret."

Her mother was eventually diagnosed with manic depression and prescribed lithium, Liberman said. "She is now 90 and lives on her own."

Her own "descent into madness," as she called it, began in the mid-1980s, when she was married with two children.

"In the 10-year acute stage of my illness, I was hospitalized 17 times, tried 27 different medications and had electroconvulsive therapy 24 times," she said.

"Most people think depression is sadness, but what I felt was numb. I also [felt] the same shame I internalized as a child."

At one point, after her husband heard her talking to friends, he "told me not to air our dirty laundry. A change in the neurochemistry of my brain had rendered me dirty laundry. Would diabetes render me dirty laundry?" she asked rhetorically.

"That [incident] began my journey from patient to consumer to advocate to loudmouth." (She is now divorced.)

The postscript to her illness, she said, was that while at Sunnybrook Hospital "on suicide watch" in August 1997, a doctor asked her to be part of a clinical trial.

"He gave me a pill, and when I woke up the next morning I saw some colour. I knew [the illness] was over. I walked out of the hospital the next day, and every day since has been a blessing."

Goldbloom said that having a family history of depression does put people at risk, "but biology is not destiny. Adverse environments do have an affect, but people are resilient."

There are also multiple types of treatment for depression, he said. "Even though the cause remains elusive, there is treatment."

Asked about what someone can do if a family member is depressed, Liberman replied: "Be there. If this is a serious depression, your loved one is in a battle for their life. Be there and help them fight."

Symposium will address end-of-life dilemmas

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Despite his experience dealing with end-of-life issues professionally, cardiologist Dr. David Borts has no ready answers when it comes to issues such as withdrawing life support and what to say to patients faced with end-of-life decisions.

Nor is he expecting participants in an April 23 End-of-Life Decision symposium to leave with answers, although he is hopeful there will be a "lively debate."

As adult education chair at Beth Tzedec Congregation, he is heading up a steering committee organizing the Sunday afternoon event being held at the synagogue.

The six-hour symposium, which is geared for health-care professionals but open to all, features five speakers including Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas. Rabbi Bulka, a longtime proponent of organ donation, is affiliated with Trillium Gift of Life, Ontario's organ and tissue donation agency.

Joining him is Rabbi David Feldman, author and dean of the Jewish Institute of Bioethics in Teaneck, N.J.; lawyer Arthur Fish; David Novak, a professor at the University of Toronto's Centre for the Study of Religion; and Laurie Zoloth, professor of medical ethics and humanities at Northwestern University.

Rabbi Bulka, Novak and Fish will discuss the halachic and secular implications of organ donation, the theological implications of advanced directives (decisions made in advance by the patient on issues including resuscitation and organ donation), and the legal implications of advanced directives, respectively.

Following that segment, Feldman and Zoloth will address halachic and secular perspectives on issues facing families of critically ill patients.

"I'm hoping that when [participants] leave, they will be able to say that whatever their own personal belief is, there is religious support for it," Borts told The CJN last week.

Grapefruit may keep heart disease away

By JUDY SIEGEL-ITZKOVICH
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Eating grapefruit, especially the red variety, or drinking its juice daily can significantly minimize "bad cholesterol" (low-density lipoprotein or LDL) and triglycerides that are major factors in cardiovascular disease, according to a study published in an online edition of the American Chemical Society's Journal of Agricultural and Food Chemistry.

The study, which also appeared in the journal's March 22 print edition, was conducted by a group of researchers headed by Shela Gorinstein of the Hebrew University School of Pharmacy's department of medicinal chemistry and natural products, and in co-operation with Abraham Caspi, head of the Cardiology Institute at Rehovot's Kaplan Medical Center. Scientists from Poland and Singapore also took part in the project as participants in lab work.

To test the benefits of consuming grapefruit, Gorinstein tested 57 patients at Kaplan who were suffering from hyperlipidemia (high levels of LDL) and had recently undergone coronary bypass surgery. None of them took statin drugs – commonly prescribed medications that lower cholesterol but in some patients can have harmful side effects.

The group was equally divided into three subgroups. For 30 consecutive days, one group received a daily single serving of fresh red grapefruit, a second received white grapefruit and a third – the control group – received none. All the participants ate balanced meals over the course of the month.

The patients who received either red or white grapefruit showed significant decreases in blood lipid levels, while the patients that did not eat grapefruit showed no changes in lipid levels. In addition, red grapefruit was found to be more effective than white in lowering lipids, particularly triglycerides – a type of blood fat whose elevated levels are often associated with heart problems.

Red grapefruit consumption reduced total cholesterol by 15.5 per cent and white grapefruits by 7.6 per cent; the red cut LDL by 20.3 per cent and the white by 10.7 per cent; and the red reduced triglycerides by 17 per cent and the white by 5.6 per cent, compared to no change in the control group.

Grapefruits contain antioxidants, Gorinstein said, noting that the red variety generally has a higher level of antioxidants than the white. It's possible that red grapefruit may contain currently unknown chemicals that are responsible for the observed triglyceride-lowering effect, she added.

Fresh grapefruit and its juice are believed to be equally beneficial, Gorinstein and her associates said. One cup of fresh grapefruit is roughly equivalent to half a cup of juice.

The researchers cautioned that grapefruit is known to interact with certain medications – sometimes adversely – and advised people on prescription medication to consult with their doctors or pharmacists before consuming grapefruit products. A delay of several hours between eating grapefruit or drinking its juice and taking medications can eliminate the problem.

In December, Gorinstein, who immigrated from Russia more than three decades ago, received the Cavalier Cross of the Polish Order of Merit, becoming the first Israeli ever to receive this Polish government honour. Gorinstein, who has achieved renown for her many research projects on the health benefits of various beverages and fruits, has worked closely with a number of Polish researchers.

INTER-GENERATIONAL PESACH: Habayit Shelanu, a supportive housing building for seniors affiliated with Circle of Care, recently held an inter-generational Pesach celebration. Grades 4 and 6 students from Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School (PPDJDS) performed Passover songs for the seniors. The program was organized by Jackie Cohen and Naomi Cornfield, social workers at Circle of Care, along with Debbie Cohen, a teacher at PPDJDS. This is the second year that the students performed at Habayit Shelanu.

Hope to address issue of organ transplants

"My hope is that when the physicians leave, they will know that experts are struggling with it just like they are."

He also hopes that participants will be motivated to address the issue of organ transplantation more frequently than they do now. "In Canada, we have a very poor rate of getting transplants. Very often, people don't want to fill out cards [indicating that they wish] to donate their organs."

The main issue facing families in crisis, said Borts, is determining the right thing to do for "a loved one who is not expected to recover, or is not expected to recover with a meaningful quality of life, and is being kept alive by machinery."

Challenges for physicians include addressing their personal perspectives and dealing with families who may be in conflict, he said.

"Families find this extremely difficult," Borts said. It may, however, be easier in one way for a patient's spouse than for other family members, he noted. "Often, spouses talk about these things."

As of last week, organizers were working on getting the event accredited for medical professionals.

For further information or to register, call 416-781-3514, ext. 34, or e-mail mlaba@bethtzedec.org. The symposium runs from noon to 6 p.m., and registration is $50 for physicians, $35 for other participants. It will be possible to register at the door, but organizers would prefer advance registration.

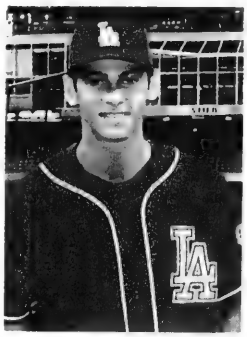
Jewish boys of summer ready for another season

By HARVEY ROSEN
Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — The Jewish boys of summer who have managed to survive the six-week spring training ritual are charged and ready for the 2006 campaign.

The Arizona Diamondbacks' outfielder and sometime first baseman, Shawn Green, 33, has reached that vulnerable stage in his career when younger prospects in the Arizona organization will likely be giving him a run for his money. Perhaps by the High Holy Days they may transform him into trade bait for contending clubs looking to shore up their lineups.



Shawn Green

Green's once-ample skills – power, average, running and fielding – have declined a bit. Mind you, he was error-less in 317 chances in 155 games in the outfield in 2005. Yet, while his batting average rose last season to .286, his home-run totals fell to 22 and his RBI total was only 73 – not the kind of numbers expected of a player who hits in the middle of the batting order and commands a handsome salary.

However, the lanky 6-4, 210-lb., former Blue Jay should rebound and enjoy a more than respectable season – for a man of his advanced age.

Gabe Kapler

At the opposite end of the spectrum, at least age-wise, is Kevin Youkilis, who will be spending more time this season at first base for the Red Sox, as opposed to the hot corner. Boston management hedged their bets on that arrangement in the off-season by signing veteran first baseman J.T. Snow, 37, a former Giant, to platoon with the 26-year-old Youkilis, who is quickly losing his "prospect" tag.

In AAA last season, Youkilis hit an impressive .322 and smacked eight homers in only 152 at bats. Riding the bench in Boston, he hit .278 and hit one ball out of the park. Despite a decent on-base average, the next base he steals will be his first in the majors.

Also in Boston is Canadian outfielder Adam Stern, 26, who appears to have caught on with the Red Sox as a fourth or fifth outfielder who can run the bases and be used as a pinch runner. The former Braves' prospect didn't hurt his major league chances with his performance at the World Baseball Classic in March with Canada's team, as well as by carrying a hot bat in spring training.

The left-handed-hitting native of London, Ont., coming off shoulder surgery in the off-season, had only 15 at bats with the Red Sox in 2005, with only one home run. In AAA, in only 81 plate appearances, he hit .321 with a pair of taters. The versatile Stern can play any outfield position.

There will likely be a third Jewish player with the Red Sox before the 2006 season gets too old. Thirty-year-old outfielder Gabe Kapler is still recovering from a severe Achilles injury sustained in mid-September while running the bases on what turned out to be a home run by teammate Tony Graffanino.

Team broadcaster Jerry Remy said Kapler took it slowly at spring training as an unsigned non-roster invitee. The lifetime .271 hitter, with occasional power, can't play for Boston until May 1, since the Red Sox didn't tender him a contract in December. He hit only .247 with one homer in only 97 at bats last season.

In a rare occurrence for Jews in Major League Baseball, Youkilis, Stern, and Kapler were all on the field in a game at the same time last season.

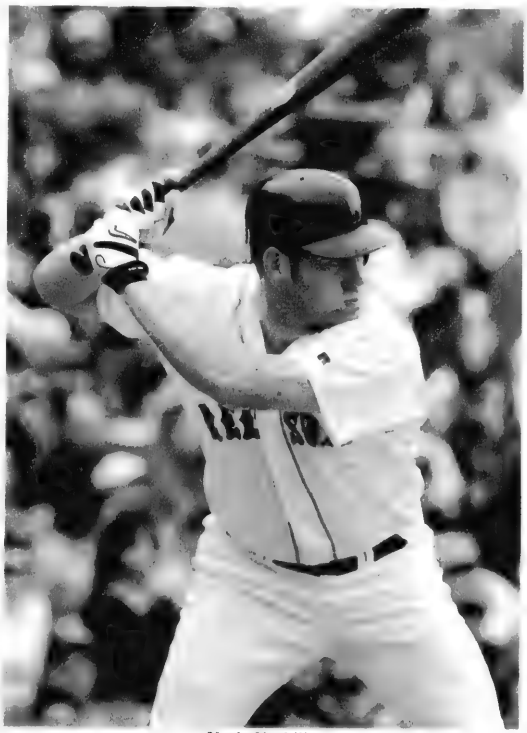
Veteran Astros' catcher Brad Ausmus, 37, seems to improve with age. Primarily an outstanding defensive catcher, the $3-million (all figures US) receiver is especially respected by pitchers, since few others take control better behind the plate than the lifetime .255 hitter. Last season, he hit .258 and drove in 47 runs. Ausmus is best remembered for his dramatic ninth inning home run in the playoffs last fall against Atlanta that resulted in a marathon 20-inning game.

Twenty-seven year old right-hander Jason Marquis of the Cardinals was signed last season to a one-year pact for $3 million. He was a workhorse in 2005, laboring 207 innings while compiling a 13-14 record and a 4.13 ERA.

As a result, the Cardinals rewarded him with a one-year contract this year for $5.15 million. That doubtless helped to assuage any disappointment left from last year in the playoffs, when St. Louis management relegated him to the bullpen.

Entering his seventh season, Marquis is an aggressive pitcher who throws a sinking fastball in the low 90s. Added to his repertoire is a crisp hard slider and an occasional changeup. He is also a good athlete who can hit and run the bases. Last season, Marquis recorded a .310 batting average with 10 extra-base hits, the most by a pitcher since 1986.

Pirates' left-handed reliever John Grabow, 27, was a workhorse in the Pittsburgh bullpen last season, appearing in 63 games while finishing at 2-3 with an ERA of 4.85 in his second full major league season. He has a fastball in the low 90s, a sharp, late-breaking slider, a good changeup and is equally adept at getting both right and left-handed batters out.



Kevin Youkilis

March 27 saw Diamondbacks' right-hander Mike Koplove, 29, assigned back to the team's minor league camp. The 5-10 hurler saw his season end early last August with arm trouble. The veteran reliever was 2-1 with an ERA of 5.07 in 44 appearances. Doubtless he'll be striving to pitch his way back to the majors as soon as possible.

On the cusp is Milwaukee Brewers' highly regarded third sacker out of the University of Miami, Ryan Braun, the fifth-overall selection in the 2005 amateur baseball draft.

Also watch for outfielder Brian Horwitz, a Giants' farm hand who in Class A ball at Augusta last season had the sixth-highest batting average in the minors at .349.

Scott Radinsky, a relief pitcher who retired in 2001, is now a pitching coach with the Indians. For the past several years, he has been a musician in a punk rock band known as Pulley.

Also watch for the likes of minor leaguers Brian Rose, Frank Charles, Tony Cogan, Adam Unger and Adam Greenberg, who all aspire to find their place in the sun.

ARTS IN FOCUS

BY OREN SHEFA

We've all heard it at some point or another on the bus, in a coffee shop or walking along the street. It's that tinny muffled sound of someone else's music escaping from the ear buds of their portable MP3 player.

The occasional disruption of blaring music may be irksome, but that minor annoyance pales in comparison to the lifelong frustration of coping with permanent hearing loss, a possibility that avid listeners voluntarily subject themselves to on a daily basis. Making matters worse, however, is the realization that while this irreparable affliction may be easily preventable, the incentive to protect one's hearing is seemingly less important than having unrestricted access to the latest modern conveniences.

Last month, the American Speech-Language-Hearing Association (ASHA) commissioned a poll on symptoms of hearing loss reported by high school students and adults related to the use of portable media.

According to the results, students report symptoms associated with hearing loss with more often than adults. A dramatic 51 per cent of high school students have admitted to either needing to turn up the volume on the TV or radio, asking "what?" or "huh?" in a regular conversation, or experiencing tinnitus (ringing in the ears), compared to just 37 per cent of adults polled.

The survey also found that even when armed with the knowledge of the potential dangers, both teens and adults have little interest in limiting their listening time, although they do become more inclined to lower the volume. But perhaps even more disturbing is the admission from parents that while most of them (59 per cent) are concerned about their children's hearing loss, less than half are willing to limit how long their kids listen.

The preventative measures the average listener would need to make are simple enough. Purchasing aftermarket headphones that cover the entire ear to replace the cheap, plastic, earbud-style ones that come with most players would help to block out external noises and allow listeners to keep the volume turned down to a more comfortable level. Audio levels should not exceed 85 to 90 decibels, and users should limit listening time in order to give their ears a chance to rest.

This isn't the first time technological convenience has clashed with public health. From microwaves to computer monitors to cellphones, advancements in consumer products that make life easier have, in some cases, had the disconcerting side effect of being potentially harmful in the long run. In these cases, convenience has always prevailed over well-being.

Cellphones are a perfect example. Concerns about cancer-causing radio frequencies emitted by cellphones became widespread at the turn of the millennium. While it may be too early to draw conclusions about the long-term effects of prolonged cellphone use, numerous health agencies around the world have been consistently appealing to the public to limit usage as much as possible. Yet, despite these repeated warnings, since 2001, the number of wireless telecommunication devices sold in Canada has increased by roughly 65 per cent, according to Statistics Canada.

If the threat of cancer is not enough to discourage consumers from using potentially harmful products, what hope does the risk of hearing loss have in acting as a deterrent?

Given how quickly the latest gadgets are absorbed into our daily lives, it seems consumers will always be playing catch-up when it comes to understanding the potential health risks associated with these products.

But what has become even more apparent is that when it comes to the conveniences of modern technology, the risks of being left behind in a connected world are far more crippling than the debilitating alternative.

DECADENT PASSOVER FUDGE BROWNIES

2 c granulated or brown sugar
1 c (2 sticks) unsalted butter or margarine, melted and cooled
3 eggs
1 tblsp brewed coffee
3/4 c unsweetened cocoa powder, sifted
1/4 tsp salt
1 scant c matzoh cake meal
1/2 c finely chopped toasted walnuts (optional)

Preheat the oven to 350°F. Lightly grease a 7"x10" baking pan, a 9" square pan, or an 8"x9" springform pan. In a bowl, mix sugar into the melted butter, then the eggs, coffee, cocoa, salt, cake meal, and toasted walnuts, if using. Spoon batter into prepared pan; bake about 25 mins. Do not overbake. The brownies should be set and seem dry to the touch, but there should not be a crust around the sides. Cool in the pan. Cut into squares or wedges. Yield: 30 squares. Pesach far from Clark Avenue

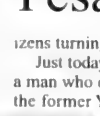
By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER



It is difficult to imagine a Jew walking through the desert, protected by a cloud sent by God, and relying on a diet of manna, a food supplied by the angels. The source of our peoplehood seems so far off that it appears to be fictional

Yet, according to the Torah, we were indeed slaves in Egypt, suffering at the hands of angry taskmasters. Consider this: If we had the benefit of video footage from those days, as we do from the Nazi era, we would see Jewish men, women and children whipped, beaten and marginalized over a long period of time.

Imagine! Our Jewish family! Spat upon. Kicked. Beaten. How removed this reality is from Clark Avenue, Old Forest Hill Road and Broadview and Danforth. Most of us can't fathom what it means to be under the thumb of another person, or another nation. My generation and afterward can't possibly understand the cruelty of a host nation and its citizens turning on neighbours or immigrants.

Just today, I sat in my office talking with a man who endured the hardships of war in the former Yugoslavia. I listened to him as he told me about friends becoming enemies, ethnic cleansing in nearby villages (a sanitized phrase that refers to the execution and persecution of an unprotected group), and his fear that his little children would be harmed.

Think about that statement, "My little children being harmed." What if when we left our homes in the morning – whether we lived in Thornhill, Forest Hill or downtown we would be terrified that a fellow Torontonian would push and shove our children? The thought is terrifying, almost impossible to consider. The picture is so blurry. Can you see it?

But that's our history, at least in part. That describes the beginnings of the Children of Israel. Our ancestors were worked to the bone as they build Pitom and Ramses, the storehouses mentioned in the Torah. They were weak and demoralized. Their sense of self had withered away.

Recline at your seder table on Pesach like a king or queen. How lovely it is to sip four cups of wine, to partake in storytelling and a feast fit for royalty. But remember, too, that Pesach is a holiday full of opposites, mostly focused on slavery versus freedom. In that light, remember that the wine we use must be red, so as to represent the blood that runs through our veins and gives us life. But it also symbolizes the blood spilled at the base of the pyramids as Jews died from exhaustion and brutal thrashings.

If you are able to see our family sweating under the desert sun as they escaped the Egyptian army, use that as the central image in your mind when you recount the story of Yetziat Mitzrayim – the Exodus from Egypt.

If you can't, then try remembering a time not so long ago when our brothers and sisters stood shoulder to shoulder in cattle cars as they were transported to concentration camps, where most of them were murdered men, women and children.

Concentrate. See our history. See yourself within it. Pesach is a brilliant opportunity to do so and the chance to appreciate the challenges we have grappled with, as well as to know the bravery exhibited by millions of Jews; the ingenuity that has allowed our people to survive; and the appreciation we should show to God.

If you manage to visualize where you came from, your Pesach will be rich and worthwhile. The Jewish people were not born out of affluence and peace – quite the opposite. Debate, discuss and consider that point with effort. It is the heart of Passover.

Chag Samayach! Happy Pesach!

Tenth Annual Passover Literary Supplement

2006 Literary Supplement

Passover Greetings

Jewish history and culture influence both young and old

Editorial

As I reflect on the more than 100 submissions we received this year for our annual Passover Literary Supplement – many more than last year – it's encouraging to see the range of themes and topics explored, as well as the different age groups of the writers themselves.

This year's collection of poetry, prose, art and photography reflects our rich culture, timeless traditions and the future of the Jewish community, as seen from the perspective of both young and old.

Poems written by a university student who was inspired after reading Alan Dershowitz's A Case for Peace; by a teenager who was overwhelmed by the beauty of Israel; and by a 10-year-old boy who compared his life to that of a young Holocaust victim all complement the poetry and prose written by older Jews who are eager to share their wisdom and experience with younger generations.

While some of the pieces featured are meant to provoke thought and stir the emotions, a deliberate effort was made to balance the more serious entries with fun and light stories that display the sense of humour Jews are famous for. From a story about a dim-witted couple who try to catch a cold to a story about a rabbi who teases one of his congregants, the common thread these entries share is the influence of Jewish history and culture, whether overt or subtle.

Along with the written works, this supplement also offers captivating photography and artwork by Michael Nisimov, a talented student of animation and graphic design at Sheridan College.

As is always the case, space was limited and we regret not being able to publish more of the submissions we collected over the past two months. To say we are pleased by the overwhelming response and the number of first-time submitters is an understatement, and we look forward to receiving even more next year.

We hope you enjoy our 10th literary supplement.

Chag Kasher v'Samayach.

A Very Happy Passover

Faigie & Rubin Zimmerman and Family

Kristallnacht, November 1938

By MARINA MASHAAL

Every day a tree lives, it's dying. Inside its vast shell, its cells transform in the same moment that its leaves are drinking up sun. It doesn't matter what form the season. A firestorm can come along and even that cannot damage seed. The trees may burn, the leaves curled to black ash, while on the ground the husk will burst open by the air's weight of storm and the sky's sulphuring heat.

A fire rages with fangs of an asp. The ground is pulled, the trunk slab scored to charred form, a generational dining table dug out, the identifying marks of age torn and splintered, the limbs of forest people ravaged like a helpless crying and reaching to the blue pockets of clean space behind a black lined sky. The seeds will spread, and, like a love-made blanket, impregnate the dry smoulder of silent fields. The heat of fire bursts the husk and spreads out all the seed.

The fire comes. It rages. It storms. And still it cannot burn out a tree's identity. A fire cannot take a tree's identity away. It may take 100 years for the forest to return to its original state, and even then, a forest knows the subtle changes of moving with its wandering exodus and origins. Even in the rage of heat and drummed down trees, the heat of life is never extinguished. Memory is hardy, spirit indivisible, and one with each cell. A hardy shrub will stay rooted, another will fly with the air and take root in the memory of a piece of land somewhere else; another will incubate and flower into slow healing in a different trajectory of time.

And so the books got burned in an evil man-made night, and pages upon pages of a people's culture and sanctimony in living went up into flames. The windows shattered, the glass spread into the air and cut at the faces of people standing. The haunting of the image stilled, and for all bearing witness, the liturgy of a people's knowing would not char in the hollow swirl of broken panes of spitting glass. Any man-made silence cannot silence nor sever a soul.

How does a forest know itself in the fire of unspeakable stillness?

A people's alone-loneliness became a resistant forest of togetherness in watch of the rising lamentation. On that very night of muting and madness, in a distant headquarter, the brute path to the Final Solution was chosen. And yet, against the ravagers, the fiery exterminatory of breaking glass working to will away all remnant, all memory, willed itself instead into a full-blown chorus of chosen witness, thereby sealing the illimitability of life over the brutality of fate. With lightning speed, a shock bolted through the wave of the gathered people. How does a forest know itself in the fire of unspeakable stillness? Know thyself, and so they stood.

They stood as one desisting the taunts hurtling. In countless years of blessed memory, the ash-blown pages sprouting from a burning tree of knowledge furled to unspoken heights above the lip of hellish-bent circles. Each gathered memory as shards of unseemly sight, unseemly smell, unseemly sound. The gathering stood, but not in a silence you can think. They stood in watch like a wiser herd listening for the memory of the blueprint irrefutable carrying the way back home.

A fire remembers. A fire, some say, is hate gone mad. A fire, another cultural life knows, is inverse love. A fire is as much emotion as it is an event. A forest fire cannot take the identity of that which is burned away. A soul is life, and so is fire.

The silence forced upon a learned people that stormed night, it is said, blew upwards into the open fields of sky like a trajectory of stars. The glass cut, the air thickened, the flames burst like 10,000 falls. A fire can never stamp out the forest memory of reclamation. The stars burning atop the flames of all of a people's gathered life, gathered knowledge, fell back onto the earth in glitters of broken light, and continued to do so over the course of many unspeakable days.

With renewed promise, a new language making shape of raw crystals of collected memory will slowly find the speech of its way back home. A forest is a harbour of the secret of promise. It understands intuitively what it means to plant a life of light beyond the dark, above the ashes, and save all souls.

The bleat of togetherness called in those millions upon millions of broken stars an anthem and the many, before a timelessness outstretching, became one soul. The glass cut, the books blackened, the hearts rose with the flames. The glass cut, the mouths that give speech splintered, the books in rising chimneys blackened to bare traces of indecipherable bone and this you will not remember, but remember it we forest will.

Yitz and Rebecca Catch a Terrible Cold

By HELAINE BECKER

Rebecca Hellman was a presser in a shirt factory. Her husband of just six short weeks was a tailor there. The factory was owned by Mr. and Mrs. Chin, who, like the Hellmans, had come to Canada from far away.

Rebecca and Yitz worked hard and were happy. At night, when they snuggled in bed, they would talk about their day.

"Mrs. Chin looked just awful today! Her nose was red and her eyes were puffy. I asked her, 'What's the matter?' She said, 'Ay, ay, ay, I have caught a terrible cold!' Tell me, Yitzy, what is this 'cold' she is talking about? And what is so terrible about it that it makes her cry?"

Yitz snuggled closer to his wife. He didn't recognize the word "cold." But admit to his sweet new bride that there was something he did not know? Never! His grandfather, after all, had been chief rabbi of Chelm.

"A cold? Oy! It is a fearsome creature," bluffed Yitz, using his best rabbi voice. "Let's not even think of one now, my love."

But Rebecca was not finished with the "terrible cold." The next morning, as the newlyweds walked to work along Baldwin Street, Rebecca said, "Yesterday, Mrs. Chin's nose was running, and she was sneezing. My nose runs and I sneeze whenever I'm in a room with a dog. Is a cold a kind of dog? Has Mrs. Chin caught a terrible wild dog?"

Yitz didn't know if a cold was a kind of dog. But admit he didn't know? Not Yitz!

"I didn't want to frighten you, my blossom," he said, handing Rebecca a cone of warm roasted chestnuts. "A cold is a fierce dog, with a hide as hard as an oak, and fangs as sharp as a hawthorn's spines."

Rebecca shivered in her thin coat.

"Then why would Mrs. Chin want to catch one?"

"Oych," replied Yitz, shrugging. "Why don't you ask Mrs. Chin?"

When she arrived at work, Rebecca did just that.

"Do you still have your 'terrible cold'?" she asked.

Mrs. Chin only said, "Ay, ay, ay," and blew her nose.

"So tell me," Rebecca prodded, "why did you go and catch a cold?"

"Why? Why, she asks? I just not lucky," Mrs. Chin scoffed.

Rebecca began to iron wrinkles from a shirt's collar. As she worked, her brow furrowed with thought. If Mrs.Chin wanted to catch a cold because she had bad luck, Rebecca reasoned, then a cold must bring good luck! Rebecca pressed on.

"What do you do when you have a cold, Mrs. Chin?"

"What do you think, you silly girl? I try to get rid of it! Now why don't you worry about doing your ironing, and let me worry about my cold."

Rebecca decided the only way to learn the truth about this "terrible cold" was to see it for herself.

"Mrs. Chin, one last question. Where is your cold?"

"Ay, the things you ask! It's in my head."

Now what kind of foolishness was this? Rebecca wondered. A terrible, wild dog? In her head? Back and forth, back and forth the iron went, along with Rebecca's troubled thoughts.

That evening, as they bought an onion and two potatoes for their dinner, Rebecca repeated the puzzling conversation to Yitzy.

"Ahhh!" exclaimed Yitz, "She did like this, nu?"

Yitz tapped his temple. Rebecca nodded.

"It is not the cold that's in her head, but a secret!" He tapped his temple again to demonstrate his point.

Rebecca crossed her arms. "Why is where she keeps her cold such a big secret?"

Yitz waggled his finger in the air like a chief rabbi about to give a sermon. "Here's why: you said yourself the cold brings luck, yes? Now that's an object of value, eh? Even a schlemazel knows you must hide your valuables!"

Rebecca waved his words away. "Valuable shmaluable. Why does she want to get rid of it, then? Answer me that!"

Yitz had no idea. But admit it? Never! After all, his grandfather had been chief rabbi! Of Chelm!

So Yitz puffed himself up and declared, "I think Mrs. Chin is trying to trick you into thinking this cold is a big nothing! So you won't try to steal it."

"Oh dear!" exclaimed Rebecca. "As if I would ever do such a thing!"

Yitz began to stroke his chin, the way the chief rabbi had done when he was thinking.

"How terrible can a cold really be – if Mr. and Mrs. Chin can catch one? They are not young and strong like us anymore.

"If they can do it, so can we! If we only knew how!"

'I think we will be lucky, my Shayna Maydeleh'

"We could use a little luck, too," said Rebecca wistfully. "I'll see what I can find out."

The next day, Rebecca got to the shirt factory early and waited until Mrs. Chin arrived to unlock the door.

"Good morning, Mrs. Chin. How is your cold today?"

"Just as bad as ever," Mrs. Chin croaked, taking off her muffler and hat.

"I don't mean to pry," said Rebecca, hanging her scarf on its peg. "But may I ask, how did you catch such a 'terrible cold'?"

"By going out at night without my galoshes!" she said, then plunked her boots emphatically into the boot tray. "Now let's get to work. It's practically 8 o'clock already."

Meanwhile, Yitz was sewing downstairs. In came Mr. Chin with puffy eyes and a nose as red as a radish. He had a raspy, growly cough, too. Apparently, the cold, like the factory, belonged to both Mr. Chin and Mrs. Chin together!

With a sharp smile, Yitz said, "Good morning, Mr. Chin! I see you have caught a cold."

Mr. Chin merely grunted, "Yes, a terrible cold."

In and out went Yitz's needle. "Where is your cold?" he asked, pointedly.

"Deep in my chest."

Yitz's needle eased through the fabric. Gently, gently, he probed.

"So how did you catch this 'terrible cold'?"

"Fishing last Sunday. At Lake Scugog," Mr. Chin growled, settling himself at his account books.

"Did you catch many fish?"

"No, just my luck. I only caught the cold."

That evening, Rebecca and Yitz could barely contain themselves.

"You'll never believe what I learned from Mr. Chin today!" crowed Yitz. "You can catch a cold at Lake Scugog! And the Chins keep their 'lucky cold' in a chest!"

Rebecca chirped, "I learned how to catch one! It must be dark, and you must be barefoot!"

"So should we try and catch our own lucky cold, Rebecca?"

"Oh, yes! Why shouldn't we have some good luck for a change? With a cold, perhaps we can own our own shirt factory!"

Rebecca and Yitz danced around their tiny parlour. "We will catch ourselves a cold! We'll be lucky! We'll be rich!"

The next day, Yitz and Rebecca bought a steamer trunk with solid brass clasps and a stout lock. They bought a map and studied it to find the best route to Lake Scugog. How long it seemed until they could leave – on Saturday, after Shabbos ended!

At last, it was time. They took a train to Port Perry, then walked from Port Perry station to the lakefront, carrying the trunk between them. It was a very cold night, but the moon was full and bright.

"I think we will be lucky, my shayna maydeleh," said Yitz.

"I feel lucky, too," said Rebecca. But inside, she was frightened. How terrible was the cold going to be? And how would they wrestle the beast into the trunk?

"This is the place," said Yitz.

Gratefully, Rebecca let down her side of the chest. The lake gleamed like a cold, dark eye. Rebecca removed her galoshes, and wiggled her toes in the night air.

"When will we know a cold is here?" she asked.

Yitz was nervous, too. But let Rebecca know he was afraid? Never! After all, his grandfather had been the chief rabbi of Chelm!

"We will know," he said in his deepest grandson-of-a-rabbi voice.

They waited. The moon hid its face behind some clouds, and still they waited. The moon peeped out from behind the clouds, and still they waited. They waited. And waited. Suddenly, Rebecca heard a dog howl. She clutched Yitz's arm. At the same time, the moon burst forth. And there, in the water, they saw it – a cold!

The shadow of a tree cast on the surface of the water, and looked vaguely like a giant hound. Quick as a needle, Yitz plunged into the icy water. Rebecca pressed her hands together and called out, "Be careful, Yitzy!"

Yitz swam to the "terrible cold." He grasped it in his arms, but it slipped away. He reached for it again, but every time he thought he had it, the cold escaped. Rebecca could see her husband's struggle. But then the moon dimmed behind the trees. The cold disappeared!

"Yitzy! Yitzy! Are you all right?"

Yitzy was too worn out to reply. He dog-paddled to shore and threw himself at Rebecca's feet.

Rebecca wrapped her coat around her shivering husband. She pressed him to her heart.

"It was too powerful for me," sputtered Yitz.

"I thought you might drown! But Yitzy, you were so brave!"

"I will catch that cold, Rebecca, even if it kills me," Yitz vowed.

"No!" gasped Rebecca. "You are the only luck I need!"

Rebecca and Yitz hugged and kissed and shivered at the edge of the lake. The sun was starting to rise in the east. Arm in arm, the chilled, bedraggled newlyweds limped to the station. By 9 a.m., Yitz's nose had begun to run. By 10 a.m., Rebecca's throat had begun to tickle. When the train reached Richmond Hill, Yitz was blowing his nose. When the train reached Thornhill, Rebecca was sneezing into her hanky. That night, in bed, Rebecca and Yitz snuggled together for warmth.

"We may not have caught a cold," coughed Yitz, "but we came very close to getting one. Perhaps that will be lucky enough."

"Who needs luck," replied Rebecca, sniffling and sneezing, "when we have love?"

The Gates of Heaven

By Ted Miller

Only Toronto Jews
Could imagine heaven's gates
Planted firmly
Just off Bathurst Street

Not at all
Like the Potemkin stairs
Of my childhood
Climbing heavenward
Like Jacob's ladder
Up from St. Clair

And even less
Like Herod's Temple Mount
Whence man and beast
Ascend beyond the stars

As for me
I've grown wary
Of monuments and real estate
And now prefer
My heaven's gates reversed

The celestial portals
Through which all souls
Descend to earth

Whither Our Tzadik?

By Lorne Switzer

Life is fleeting not to be wasted
says the Book that he opened.
Love is a fugitive sharply bitten says the Experience forever unwritten.
Always in a sprint
Passing as shadows
Forgotten memories and dried-up tears.
No more farewells and embraces
No reason to pilgrimage from faraway places
The weaver and the woven are no longer tethered
No more friends true and fair-weathered
No more enemies, all unsought
The last battle was already fought
On Tisha b'Av, not a time for words
Not for laughter at the absurd
Approaching the meaning of the crowns
Finding them at last
He left us
Only silence
Broken by an afternoon hamseen carrying a lifeless tune;
a Righteous gasp,
an unfinished song

The Rabbi Had a Sense of Humour

By ALVIN ABRAM

For 20 years, I would often discuss religion and its place in Jewish life with the late Rabbi Albert Pappenheim of Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue in Toronto. I came from a non-religious background, had not gone to Hebrew school and was unaware of the religious procedures of a Jewish way of life. The rabbi decided to subject me to a first-hand involvement.

I received a note from him asking if I would make myself available in two weeks for Sabbath services to receive an honour. My attendance at Sabbath services, as Rabbi Pappenheim was well aware, usually depended on need and persuasion. To be singled out to perform a religious function in front of hundreds of people, especially many who knew me, was frightening. I quickly declined.

When I told my wife Marilyn of the rabbi's request and my refusal, I was met with a stern look of displeasure. It didn't take long before my two daughters, Lisa and Lori, became aware of my refusal, and they also gave me no peace.

Rabbi with Torah*, oil on canvas by Mané-Katz (1894-1962)

After being subjected to their continuous hounding for several days, I reluctantly relented and I telephoned Rabbi Pappenheim to tell him that I had changed my mind. I made him promise that I was not to have a speaking part. He told me that he had the right honour for me. My participation would be painless and my performance flawless. I was to take the Torah from within the Ark and hand it to the cantor.

I accepted with trepidation.

On the day in question, I reluctantly found four vacant seats by the centre aisle. Rabbi Pappenheim's instructions were to come early and to take an aisle seat in the middle of the sanctuary. Those who knew me could not hide their look of disbelief when they saw me enter. From where I sat, I could see some of them whispering to their spouses and motioning in my direction.

The front of Beth David's sanctuary has two levels. The first set of steps leads to two lecterns where the cantor and the rabbi stand. Behind them are a half-dozen ornate chairs, spaced equally along the back of the platform. A spiral staircase winds its way upwards to a second level where the Ark, with its decorative gold enclave and two sliding doors, conceals several velvet-covered scrolls, each with a silver or gold engraved plate attached

I heard the processional enter the sanctuary. The cantor came first, chanting, as the small entourage approached me, with Rabbi Pappenheim behind him, followed by senior synagogue officials. I could feel the perspiration running from my forehead. I suddenly realized that the rabbi hadn't told me which scroll to pick up. This made me uneasy. I just knew that I would foul things up and make myself look foolish. I prayed that the rabbi would pass me without acknowledging my presence, but when he came along side of me, I heard him say, "Follow us," without moving his lips.

I joined the procession. Marilyn had a wide smile on her face and the girls were beaming. The cantor and the rabbi mounted the steps and went to their respective lecterns. The synagogue officials sat down in the chairs along the back. As I approached the rabbi, my heart pounded a tattoo in my chest and my eyes were frantically sending out a Morse code informing him of my dilemma. The rabbi ignored my facial pleading and faced the congregation. He whispered from the corner of his mouth, "Sit down." Since there was only one vacant seat, that became an easy objective.

The services continued unabated while I sat nervously holding a prayer book upside down in my lap. Suddenly the congregation stood up and the cantor, rabbi and officials headed toward the spiral staircase. I immediately jumped to my feet, almost toppling my chair. I kept my eyes on the rabbi, hoping that he would give me a signal. He did not.

The cantor and the rabbi stopped in front of the Ark. Two people from the processional stood at opposite sides of the doors, and I hesitantly moved to the centre. Slowly the two doors slid open. The rabbi was not looking at me. My eyes flashed from side to side hoping someone would give me a clue, but I was ignored. When the doors were open, I stepped forward. Leaning against one of the scrolls was a printed white card with the words, "THIS ONE."

A groan of relief escaped my lips. I stepped forward, raised the scroll and handed it to the cantor. He took it and proceeded to the lower level. Rabbi Pappenheim winked at me as he passed. I knew he was laughing to himself. There were other times when he asked if I would participate in Sabbath services. I declined. He said he understood, but he had a smile on his lips

Jewish Quarter

By Israel Sarna

Square stones brightly bleached by the sunlight of three thousand years
Glossed with the moisture of lips and tears salting away the oversized rock surface
The optimum kingdom has itself eroded much over time
Wrinkled like a dry raisin through the ages from its original grape cluster
Cane-dependent inhabitants hobbling along cobbled meandering alleyways

The harp replaced by the haunting wail of sorrows tallied in collective sufferance
The walls of the calcified capital rose and fell like a seesaw abused by hyper children
Things have not gone as planned for the People of the Book
If you take a good look
As if Heaven disengaged from the Chosen unilaterally long ago

So it rests with the competent curious to excavate dirt and rubble
Praying in ancient languages to discern the way back to a time of favour
When towering Temples stood seemingly forever
And the greatest enemies of Israel were not established innately within tanned Hebraic skin

The sabra has again and lately lost its prickly exterior for all but its own
As the arch nemeses stitch rival flags and rally victory's chants
Readying the conclusive strike against a hopelessly divided tribe
Lost to its initial saviour shepherd

In the faded jaded Jewish Quarter
The slumbering number of an ancient age
Ratifies itself another day by virtue of its ongoing degeneration
While its prospects dissipate like a city gate before Roman siege machinery

It seems more and more that not for long
Will Zion's song have a throat to horn it proudly
Only sad violins will contemplate the painful dirges of what might have been
Had kin stuck by kin
Planting modern shoes in dusty sandal prints of impassioned ancestors
Instead of surrendering to imperial pressures in contemporary guise

Here stand Jacob's progeny at truth's moment with eager foreign eyes aglow
Straining across continents for a better view of self-immolation on Jehovah's cracking altar
A taunting refrain looping in resenting minds
Mellah, mellah, mud-brick and wall
Who's the eldest of them all – but soon historic relic!
An ironic revenge enacted before their seedy sight
The Israelite people on its sacrificial deathbed carefully laid out
Finally headed the natural way of the fossilized Philistine
The pounds of patrimony too burdensome for shekel-seeking slacking shoulders
Collapsing at the first capricious waft of world opinion's irresistible breeze.

Fasika 1988

By JUDIE ORON

Pushing through the doorway of our family's tukul, I come up against the morning fog. Thick, cold and mysterious, it forms a protective barrier that cuts our village off from the outside world. Spiky mountains, rolling hills dotted with grazing horses, scattered villages – all are hidden today. Every morning it is so. It is a sight that greets me day after day, a view that reminds me once again of what will, very soon, be lost to me.

The sun has not yet begun to rise but already our small village has been turned upside down. My young sisters rush to the stream to wash our clothes. Mother is breaking and burying the cooking utensils, coaxing last night's embers to life and preparing to create new, unsullied dishes and pans for fasika, the Passover feast. When all this is done, my father and young brothers will gather around the sheep that are to be slaughtered and soon smoke and cooking smells will blanket the village.

All this activity is making my heart's beating resonate throughout my whole body. I can feel it in my hands, in my aching head, in the soles of my feet as they tread on the cold, hard ground.

As I near the object on the ground I realize that it is Mehari and he is both bloody and alive

Escape is the only way. Whenever I feel that I will explode with the pounding of my heart, running has always calmed me. No matter what my punishment will be I know that I don't have the patience to stay and work with my mother and my little sisters.

A few short months after fasika, I am to be married. My mother says that I simply must prepare myself for the wedding. "This is how things are, this is the way we live," my father tells me, trying to be patient with my entreaties. But I know that this is something that I just cannot do, no matter how binding a contract my father and Dawit's father have written.

My situation, in some ways, is better than that of other girls my age. I have seen my intended, actually spoken to him, and he is pleasing to speak to, pleasing to look at. My father explains that Dawit is from a good family, that his mother is a loving person who will treat me like a daughter and that I will be coddled and cherished until we are old enough to consummate the marriage and live in a separate tukul. But what good is all that if I must leave my family, my home, my new baby sister, whom I just know will not grow to be as sturdy as she would if I were there to guide her?

Dawit's family lives far away, in Lasta province. There are shifta'och, brigands, and rebels in Lasta; this I have heard. "That is exactly why you must marry," my father says. "So many people have left for Jerusalem. Only a few of us Beta Israel have stayed here in Debre Behar. Those that are left are like me, blind or old or ill, too feeble to make the trek to Sudan. You must be married to a man whose village is still full of men, to a family that can protect you."

I hear with sadness the pleading in my father's voice. Before his accident would he have pleaded with me?

"Come, Lemlem," my mother says with a rare impatience, as I stare at the tendrils of fog, now floating away in gentle trails where only moments ago there was a wall of pure milk. "In a moment, enutie," I call, moving purposefully toward the edge of the village. Let her think that I have gone beyond the fog to relieve myself. I start to run as fast as I can toward the fields where my brother, Mehari, will be tending the animals. I can always talk to Mehari. He has been to school in Ambover and he is very wise for his years. He has lived among the Christianos, and although he has kept himself pure, he has learned things that others in our village have never even imagined. And, even if he cannot change my father's mind, perhaps he can help me to stop this terrible beating of my heart.

I run and run and finally I break through the last wisps of fog and come out at the top of the rise. How beautiful it is here, I think. But this is not our land, I remember, thinking of what we have been told by the kessoch. We are here only temporarily, the rabbis say, and some day we too will go to Jerusalem. If only I could run as far as Jerusalem, I think, and not have to marry. But then I would have to leave everyone behind and that's nearly the same thing. My head aches with trying to find a solution. Mehari will help me, I think, hurrying to find my brother. But, something is wrong. I should have found him long ago.

"Mehari," I shout, running to the lookout hut and clambering up the slats to search in all directions. The cattle are nowhere to be seen. Mehari would never leave the cattle, I think. Unease fills my soul as I turn this way and that to look for my brother. In the distance, near the church, I spot a bundle of clothes on the ground. Hurrying down the slats, nearly tripping in my rush, I run up the slope, and as I near the object on the ground I realize that it is Mehari and he is both bloody and alive.

"Ayee! Minden neuw, what happened?" I shriek, bending over my brother and trying to help him in his futile efforts to rise. His leg appears to be broken, his head is bleeding and he is crying – how odd, I think, I have never seen him cry.

"Go to the village, ahutie, my sister," he says quietly. "Go, it will be all right, bring the men back here to help me. Run, Lemlem."

Passover Greetings

'Now is the time, you must go to Sudan and from there you will be taken to Israel'

That evening, after we have prayed and feasted and sung the fasika songs – a bit sadly since our numbers have been so depleted – we huddle around the dying fire to listen once again to my brother's story.

"I was gathering the animals to bring them back to the village," Mehari began. "Steeped in my thoughts, I forgot that it was Timket, Easter, and that we are not supposed to work on the Christianos' holy days," he confessed, lowering his head in shame.

"I was just gathering the last stray into the herd, when a crowd of people spilled out of the church and began running toward me, shouting, 'This is how you defile our holiest day, killer of Christ!' I could not run away, fearing that they would steal our animals, so I faced them and began to apologize. I hoped that I would get away with a light beating. But their rage was terrible. They thrashed me with their sticks, breaking my leg. I closed my ears to their curses and eventually, the priest said, 'Baka! Enough! We must stop now. What if we were to kill him? His father is an ironmonger. Everyone knows that they are buda, devils, with terrible powers. He could strike us all dead with just one glance if we were to kill his first-born son. Let us leave him here and go back to our prayers.'

"To my relief, they all left and I tried to get up, but I could not. I must have fallen asleep because when I woke up, all the animals were gone, all our tools as well, and Lemlem was leaning over me. I am so sorry, father, for causing this terrible loss," Mehari said.

"What is more troubling," my father answered, "is that you cannot work until your wounds heal and we must now find a way to survive until you can. My blindness prevents me from making tools. Your brothers are too young to provide protection from the Christianos. All my own brothers are gone, gone to Jerusalem. What shall we do?" he asked, looking toward the stars for answers. "Shall we move from our village to a place where there are more of our people?"

We sit in silence. "Can we not carry Mehari to Jerusalem?" I ask respectfully, fearing my father's anger. He remains silent, thinking. "This is what we will do," he says, and for the first time since his accident blinded him, I hear the decisive voice of my father of old. "We will all go to Lasta. We will join Dawit's family and try to persuade them to go with us to Jerusalem. The way will be difficult, but I think that with things as they are we can do nothing else."

My story does not end here, as you might imagine. Believe it or not, I am writing now from Korea. You might well wonder how I got from a village in Ethiopia to this place in only a few short years. The answer, like the rest of my story, is filled with small miracles and fortuitous circumstances.

The way to Lasta was, indeed, a difficult one. We crossed the line of fire, evading both the rebel and the government forces with many near catastrophes, carrying Mehari and the remainder of our property. We arrived in Dawit's village just as they were preparing to send a runner to us saying that they had had emissaries from Jerusalem. Their message, "Now is the time, you must go to Sudan and from there you will be taken to Israel."

Well, the road to Sudan was long and harsh, and fraught with trials. The refugee camps where we waited to be redeemed were terrifying and filled with death. But by the grace of God we made it onto a flight to Israel, all of us safe and healthy – a very unusual outcome in that devastating place.

Dawit and I are the best of friends, and perhaps some day we will fulfil our parents' decree to marry. It would be a beautiful thing if we were to be married in Jerusalem, in a modern wedding hall, with all the family members who left Ethiopia years ago gathered around us. That would be good, but for now we are content to be friends and to finish our studies. Our parents are not happy with this decision of ours, but they understand that in Israel it is important to have an education.

My father's choice of a husband I can now see was a fortunate one, for Dawit is a man who understands my need to run. And this running has led to a profession – who would have thought? Later this morning I will be racing for Israel at the Olympics in Seoul, South Korea, and surely there could not be a stranger or happier ending to a story than mine.

I look out of my hotel room and admire the fog that floats over my balcony railing. It is not the thick impenetrable fog of Gonder, yet I know that it is a sign. For surely it is telling me that I will win my race and bring glory to my new land.

An Ethiopian-Israeli holds a little girl during the Ethiopian Jewish holiday, Sigad. It is a holiday that signifies the yearning for Zion, and its origin dates back more than 2,500 years. [Isranet photo]

HAVING A WORD WITH GOD: An Israel Defence Force soldier is immersed in prayer at the Kotel. [Israel Sun photo]

At The Kotel

By Sandy Bye Richler

We are a circle praying
Breathing life into each sacred stone
Our feet fill the impressions
Of souls unknown
Humble eyes gaze up with wonder
At this almighty sight
Filled with the hopes and fears we write.
This is not a wall that divides
It nurtures our faith
As we stand, side by side

This wall supports us, when we feel weak
Soothes the sorrow we dare not speak
Hope may crumble, but faith endures
In a world so insecure.
Promises were made in the sand
So dreams could flower in this Holy Land.

Rock of words
Who will be your voice?
So our stories are heard.
Tucked in a crevice at night
They lie untouched, under the moonlight.

Inspired
A gust of desert wind came along
Blowing the spirit of every note into a song
Hear o Israel
We all belong.

Passover Greetings

Ode to an Israeli War

By Dana Gold

Sirens sounding
Children running
Soldiers shooting
The end is near
Yet it has just begun
Two sides
Two people
One country
Leader dying
People crying
Thousands of lives for the taking Covering of the eyes
Shielding of the bodies
Holding on to those you love
Reciting of prayers
"Shema Yisrael HaShem Elokainu HaShem Echad"
Then it comes Explosions
Fire Blood
Tick tick tock
All is quiet
Wind is blowing
No one to be seen
No one to be heard
All is dead
All is fallen
The Israeli flag stands
Beauty in the wreckage
Blowing in the wind
Standing for freedom
For courage
For life
For the country that may be
For the country that will be Forever tall
Forever standing
The Star of David stands free

Shalom, forever may you be in peace

Lunch with Izzie – November 1, 1994

A tribute to Irving Layton

By SHEL KRAKOFSKY

There are brightest apples on those trees
but until I, fabulist, have spoken they do not know their significance

With Dalia at the wheel, we pick him up on Monkland Avenue at his semi-detached, red brick house in the pleasant Notre Dame de Grâce neighbourhood of Montreal. He is charming to my wife, and during the ride to the trattoria, he asks if I speak Yiddish. Delighted that I do, he engages me in lighthearted banter and chitchat, obviously pleased and laughing that we are engaged in his earliest language. He refers to himself as Izzie.

As he gets out of his car, his Parkinson's disease is obvious, the short, hesitant strides diagnostic.

"Don't be so proud," I tell him. "Use a cane. The last thing you need is a broken hip."

"I don't need a cane," he says mildly. I hold him under the arm the rest of the way. He doesn't resist.

All this I saw through my improved binoculars.

He has brought two books with him, his own, A Wild Peculiar Joy, and another called Escape from Evil by Ernest Becker. Almost as soon as we are seated, he begins to admonish me "not to write another poem, not to read another book, not to experience anything whatsoever until you've read Becker's book." Still exaggerating after all these years.

Irving Layton

He is distinguished, with stylishly long white hair, and despite gentle wrinkles and facial age spots, he looks completely appropriate with jeans, sweater and a pipe. When I tell him I recently received a letter from one of his former students telling me that he was the greatest teacher she ever had (she is now a neurologist), he is excited.

"No praise means more to me. Nothing good that has ever been written about me means more to me than to be told I was a good teacher."

I show him my small date book where I jotted down the name and address of the restaurant. Printed on each page is a saying or quotation. By happy coincidence, today's entry says: "By walking, I found out where I was going." — Irving Layton.

"You see," he declares, "I really am timeless!"

Spry and drugged with love
I pole-vault over my grave.

He knows what I do for a living. He begins a diatribe against the medical profession. "You guys know about the body, but nothing about the soul. You have to deal with both when you're treating people. I've been asked by the medical school to give a seminar to the students on that very topic. The soul is very important, you know."

I tell him, "The soul you think you know about has nothing to do with the real soul. When you talk about pole-vaulting over your grave, that has nothing to do with souls. It has only to do with extending mortality, with delaying death. Fair enough, but it has nothing to do with the soul as a Jewish concept. You only think of it in a Dionysian way. Pleasure, passion, emotion,-esthetics. Your poetry only deals with your version of soul in this world. It's the soul that remains after the pole-vaulting is over that is significant. You don't mean neshamah, the soul that goes with you after life. The soul your father believed in."

"I try not to think about it, but now that you mention it, I now recall when I first comprehended your version of the soul. I was six years old and my mother was cupping her hands over and blessing the Shabbos candles. I distinctly remember thinking of that Jewish flame as something eternal."

'For reasons of rebellion, he never had a bar mitzvah'

"You were prescient and a poet at six! Are you familiar with the ner tamid? That's what you discovered over your mother's Sabbath candles. It's the flame over the ark in synagogues."

"Ah yes. What does it mean?"

"It means eternal light and it stays on all the time. It represents the continuity of mankind, the omnipresence of God and what we're talking about – the immortality of the soul."

"You mean the neshamah."

"Yes. Do you believe in it?"

A long pause as he returns to his food. "It's possible," he says without expression.

Whatever else poetry is freedom

He is complimentary about my writing and begins to recite some of my own poetry aloud to the amused and bemused customers. He then announces that he plans to attend the reading that I have been invited to give in Montreal that evening. "I'd be delighted to have you in the audience," I say with some understatement.

"I don't want to just sit there," he booms. "I want to give a reading too!"

"I'm honoured," I tell him, and don't mind at all sharing the stage with him.

He laughs, "Don't be so honoured. I'm not going for reasons of community. I'm going for reasons of vanity!"

* * *

It took me too long to perceive that there is a God who doesn't exist anywhere, not in the heavens or in the hearts of men

He mentions that for reasons of rebellion, he never had a bar mitzvah. He is approaching his 83rd birthday. I tell him there is a tradition of having a bar mitzvah at that age, because 13 plus the proverbial three score and ten adds up to 83.

"But I don't know which portion of the Torah corresponds to my birth date."

It's easily looked up, I tell him, if he gives me his birth date. March 12, 1912, he writes on a piece of paper

"I'm not even sure if that's right. Coming from Romania, I was told later my birth date was either March 5 or March 12. Eventually, I decided on March 12. You know why?" He pauses with a dramatic grin. "That's the day Stalin died!"

"Do you want to have a bar mitzvah?"

"If you make me one, I'll be there. And I'll give a reading."

"You don't have to give a reading. But you would have to learn the proper blessings to say over the Torah."

"I know broches [blessings]," he boasts and rapidly recites in Hebrew the blessing over bread. "And I'll give a reading."

"You would have to learn the proper blessings."

"Easy. And then I'll give a reading. How much do I get paid?"

"Nobody gets paid for having a bar mitzvah."

"I know one isn't supposed to touch cash on the Sabbath, so pay me by cheque. And I'll give a reading."

"Sorry, no deal. Think about it some more and if you're still interested in having a bar mitzvah, let me know."

"And I'll give a reading."

I tread with them the selfsame antique road and seek everywhere the faintest scent of God

He reminisces about David Lewis and A.M. Klein. "I used to love listening to them debate. They never lost to anybody. If David was ever boxed into a corner, he would devastate his opponents with a barrage of logic they couldn't handle. And Abe could pummel his opponents with brilliant and merciless wit. In private, the two of them debated often, but they were smart enough never to take each other on in public."

* * *

How to dominate reality? Love is one way; imagination another.

He is wistful when he describes the relationship between David and Sophie Lewis.

"They taught me about love. I never knew what love was until I met those two. Completely devoted and infatuated with each other. Nothing I ever wrote, read or lived came close. I still haven't seen the kind of lasting love those two had."

Dalia would later note that despite his many relationships, poems and marriages, not ever finding the kind of love he saw in the Lewises has been the greatest tragedy of his colourful life.

Living is an affair for aristocrats

When it is time to leave, Dalia points out that if he were Picasso, it would only be necessary for him to sign the bill and we could have eaten for free. He playfully takes the bill, signs it and draws a cute self-caricature. The eyes are shaped like two question marks.

"Let's see what happens," he says.

The waiter doesn't even look at the bill.

* * *

And I, a singer in season observe Death as a name for beauty not in use

At the evening reading, the audience is very warm to his unannounced arrival. Gasps, hugs, good wishes all around. When he is introduced, he walks briskly and confidently to the podium. He is pole-vaulting over all his infirmities. He gives a superb reading, the voice sure, the cadences unmistakable, the emotion true. He reads some of his best and most famous poems and concludes with a moving version of Keine Lazarovitch: 1870-1959

To enthusiastic applause, he leaves the stage with the brio and walk of a much younger man. He takes his seat beside me and asks, "Well, how did I do?"

"You know what?" I tell him. "I think you have a future."

"My problem," he says with a toothy smile, "is that I have a past!"

* * *

but shall bring to you from time to time my hot Hebrew heart

Will Izzie Lazarovitch have a bar mitzvah? The only thing I know for certain is that Irving Layton will give a reading.

Shel Krakofsky has twice received the National Jewish Book Prize for poetry. He practices medicine in London, Ont., and was the founding editor of Parchment.

Barmaid

By LYNN GOLD

Harry could do no wrong. Wild as he was, whatever tricks he played on his sisters, his mother, Malka, forgave and excused him, and acted as a buffer between him and his father's anger. He was the only son left of 14 babies, seven of whom survived infancy.

Even when he swapped a shoe brush for Papa's hair brush, she covered for him. Papa was already stone blind, but still very vain about his luxuriant beard and hair. That morning, he came to breakfast streaked with brown shoe polish from crown to collar. Malka glared at the children to stop them from giggling or commenting on their father's bizarre appearance. Later she warned them all, "Not a word to your father about this." Papa never learned of Harry's practical joke. Harry was Malka's darling.

By the time he was 20, he had run through and ruined two business enterprises funded by his father. They dissolved in bars and racetracks, and into the pockets of his drinking pals.

Papa refused to back this profligate son again. Malka pleaded, "He's only a boy. It was his friends that ruined him. Give him another chance."

When Papa proved immovable, she sneaked her savings to Harry.

"Jake Singer's putting up his haberdashery for sale. His doctor says his heart won't take it any more. It's a nice little business, and he'll accept this much as down payment."

It wasn't enough for Harry's grandiose schemes. He went back to the track and put it all on the nose of a long shot that never even made it to the finish line. He told his mother he'd been rolled in a bar.

Malka said, "My poor boy, you just don't have any mazel [luck]. But bars are no place to meet nice people."

His only recourse now was to marry money. With his good looks, curly black hair and magnetic charm, he had the pick of the girls in town. But his target was the 33-year-old spinster daughter and only child of the town's richest banker. He wooed, won and married Rose within a space of five weeks. Knowing that his security lay with his father-in-law, he impregnated her within a month. They brought forth three children in the first five years.

Malka fended off criticism of this May-December marriage. "Rose will make him a good wife. Yes, she's 13 years older. But she's steady – she'll be a good influence on him. She's a nice Jewish girl. And look at her father, the richest man in town!"

His timing was bad. The youngest child was a year old in 1929 when the market crashed and every bank in the state went under. Harry had no expectations and was saddled with a plain and querulous woman and three children. No more treating the boys at the bar. No more racetrack.

> With his good looks, curly black hair and magnetic charm, he had the pick of the girls in town

For the next 20 years, he was a hard-working employee at the hardware store. Harry supported his family but became miserly, saving every dollar he could. He was a devoted father and a stoic husband.

Malka boasted, "You see? He's a good boy. He just needed to settle down."

When the youngest child went off to college, Harry walked out, taking only $10,000 for a new start. He bought a bar in Belle Glade, a watering hole in the heart of Florida's agricultural belt, where the rich soil yielded three crops a year to ship to the fruit-and-vegetable-starved north.

Malka said, "That Rose has a tongue like a whip. She's never had a sweet word to say to him. As long as he takes care of the children, I know he did the right thing to leave."

The farmers spent lots of money in Harry's bar. They liked his breezy bonhomie and enjoyed watching his pretty barmaid Claire. But not one of them tried anything. Harry had a fearsome temper, and they knew Claire was Harry's property.

In 10 years, he had enough to sell the bar and buy a motel on the Sunshine Coast. He did the yard work and cleaned the pool, and Claire made beds and scrubbed toilets. She was a good, fast-working chambermaid.

Malka said, "The hotel business is clean and steady, not like a bar. A bar is no place for him. What kind of people come to a bar? Goyim! Shikkurs! [Gentiles! Drunks!] He's smart; he'll make a fortune."

She even forgave him for living with a shiksah. "You know men. A man needs a woman. Just as long as he doesn't bring her into my house." She added, "He'll meet a nice Jewish girl, you'll see. He's not too old to get married again. Any girl would be glad to marry my Harry."

'I have no son'

When he saw grey at his temples, Harry called his nephew, the attorney, to make him a will. The lawyer was appalled to learn that Harry had never divorced Rose or married Claire. His whole estate, by law, would go to his wife and children.

"You've lived with Claire and exploited her all these years. You have to take care of her. I'll file for the divorce and you marry her as soon as it's final, Uncle Harry. You have to regularize her status and rights." Harry agreed, and the divorce and remarriage were accomplished in record time.

Malka called her daughters together. "Your brother has broken the faith. He is no longer a member of our people or a member of our family. I have no son. We will mourn your brother together."

Her youngest daughter implored her. "Mama, mama, Harry's not dead. He's happy for the first time in years. All that time living without love, and now..."

Malka clenched her sodden handkerchief and closed her swollen eyelids. "She's a shiksah. Rose was a nice Jewish girl. My son is dead and I will sit shivah for him."

For a week, surrounded by her daughters, she sat in a hard chair in her bedroom slippers. She rent her garments. All that time she wept and mourned. This was not a typical shivah with many visitors eating the food spread on the dining room table. There was no gossip, no laughter, no family catching up on stories. They all knew that Malka would never again utter her son's name, to the day she died.

Her daughter watched her grow old before her eyes. "Mama, mama, you're hurting yourself more than you're hurting Harry."

"How can I hurt him? He's dead."

"Mama, why are you so hard on yourself?"

Malka sat rigid in the hard chair, the white hairs slipping from her neat bun, shoulders bowed and hands folded in her lap. She intoned the stock, standard phrase that the children had had drummed into them all their lives.

"It's hard to be a Jew."

Upon Reading
A Case for Peace

By Jesse Schwartz

And from the flames of Auschwitz came the rage
The sadness and the loss, the grim desire
To understand why widow, orphan, sage
Were gassed and tossed like wood into the fire

But with the tears and ashes came a nation
And passion to fight off the final doom
We saved ourselves from annihilation
And with our sweat we made the desert bloom

But still this nation, harbour of my hope
Is treated like no other of the earth
Condemned by most as it attempts to cope
With those who would reverse its very birth

Before you judge, learn what we've won and lost
A hollow word can have a deadly cost

Neshamah, the soul's

DANCING IN THE STREETS: Israelis celebrate Purim with a parade in Tel Aviv.

Israel

By Joseph E. Rubenstein

The pinch of constant bewilderment captivated my senses – immersed amongst the everyday life of my people;
on their turf
in my homeland

The constant chatter humming with birds and music in the background the sun shining down on the Holy Land – outdoor cafés in full swing with endless activity bustling

The multinational mosaic
all members of the same culture the Russian Jew on the organ the Ethiopian Jews playing with delight in the wonders of the street the European Jew immersed in the crowd, the born Israeli, busy, in love with their life, their country, the elderly, who come at the end of their lives, the closer to God and me, the tourist from Canada trying to figure it out only to realize that it is unnecessary to do so.

Although at 21 years of age, this is my first visit to this land; I have realized that it is my home

Was part of my soul before I set foot on its soil and inspired me during my visit and I am convinced that I will be drawn here for the rest of my life.

This land of my father's and his this land of mine
this land belongs to my sons to all the children of God

This land goes beyond the magical into the realm of the mystic to a place not eroded by time but improved – safer, and stronger by the minute, comfortable, beautiful and warm
this is the promised land.

Interior of Bordeaux Synagogue with its Architect Corcelles, oil on canvas by Jean Lubin Vauzelle Angerville (born Engerville 1776)

The Old Synagogue

By Mandy Lirit Ginzburg

Where men bob heads under stitched prayer shawls like buoys in the sea, where the eternal flame fights with its flickering reflection like boxers throwing punches in the ring, where the chazzans' haunting voices sing,
trailing goosebumps on the congregants' skin,
where paint dulls the outline of swastikas, scabbing the bricks by the hands of haters remember the covenanted rainbow, oh Lord, and do not flood our land with blood again,

where women sway, balancing babies on their hips, and whisper lisped prayers, moving slightly their lips, as Chana in Shiloh, where the rabbi lowers his Brillolike beard, na na-ing and oy oy-ing into the coiling mass, wrapping his tallis tighter, tassels sweeping the floor, he stands beside the Ark, smelling the oak where the Torahs are chested, spilling God's words, where children play in holiness, barefoot like Moses, answering Amen.

On my Birthday

By Sam Lewkowict
(10 years old)

At my birth I was eight pounds,
At his birth he almost died.

When I turned one, my parents loved me,
When he turned one, his parents got taken away.

When I turned two, my parents carried me all over the house,
When he turned two, he was chased by the Nazis.

When I turned three, I went to bed without a fuss.
When he turned three, he wished he had a bed.

When I turned four, I got a tricycle.
When he turned four, he got a tattoo with numbers.

When I turned five, I ate chocolate,
When he turned five, he ate tar.

When I turned six, I broke my shoulder,
When he turned six, the Nazis broke his spirit.

When I turned seven, I dreamed about heaven,
He never turned seven, and his soul went up to heaven.

Barbara

By RUTH ALMON

Barbara awoke each morning at exactly 7 a.m. and started the day with a cup of tea and three chocolate chip cookies – one of the few luxuries she allowed herself.

The first time she approached a supermarket in her adopted country, she stood a long while at the entrance, watching people enter and leave. Only the next day did she venture in to look at the high shelves packed with strange products that taunted her. She dared not buy anything for fear it would not be what she expected. Yet, if she left empty-handed, people would notice.

After walking along the aisles, after selecting and rejecting countless items, Barbara, with a fine line of sweat running down her back, settled on a bag of chocolate chip cookies. The sweat made her want to scratch, but she held back. Facing the gum-chewing cashier, Barbara reached into her purse and indiscriminately pulled out a bill, unable to make out the denomination.

"What country prints all its money in the same colour?" she thought.

Barbara occasionally wondered who she might have been had she not experienced the war. Certainly, she would have been less timid. But between work and raising David and Dina, life left her little spare time for such pondering. The fact was that a young girl named Sophie died and kept on living and assumed an American-sounding name – though it never sounded very American when Barbara herself pronounced it.

Whose fault is it if one survives?

She rarely allowed her mind to stray onto thoughts of how she would have lived her new life if she had not met Max. It was unthinkable.

Max found it difficult to suppress a slight smile when he saw her for the first time, battling with herself and the supermarket. He knew her even before they spoke. The second time he saw her there, he plunged straight into Yiddish, asking her if she needed any help. She opened her mouth, unable to speak.

"It's OK," he said. "I understand."

Max's passion was music. In Czechoslovakia, he played the cello, but since his fingers were injured during the war, he opened a shop for classical sheet music. He slowly taught his wife everything he knew about the business. For years, they worked side by side, and on Thursdays, they went to the supermarket to do their weekly shopping. And when, now and again, too many memories percolated to the surface, Max would hold her while neither of them said a word.

Barbara picked up her third cookie and took a bite out of it, leaving a small bit to go with her last sip of tea. She showered and put on a beige skirt and a cream-coloured blouse. Only rarely did she go into the music shop since David took over. Her son had remodelled and expanded it, and added a section for modern music. Barbara was pleased, but now that Max was gone, it was not her shop anymore. She would never think to advise David on how to run the business that she helped build for so many years – and besides, he would never ask.

Today was a Monday, which meant that Barbara would visit her daughter. Dina was named after Barbara's little sister, though no one knew. When her daughter was born, Barbara took a long look at the infant and stated, "This child must be named Dina."

Just like that. This display of self-assurance was so totally out of character that Max never thought to ask why she chose the name Dina. He knew that Barbara had once had a little sister named Helen. He'd never known her Hebrew name.

Dina was forever trying to encourage her mother to get out, try new things, join clubs. When Dina started one of her campaigns, Barbara found that the easiest line of action was to agree to think about it. She hadn't liked going to new places when Max was alive, and now, two years after his death, she liked it even less.

"Why don't you try some of the activities at the shul?"

"You know I'm not religious. What business have I to do there?"

'Barbara's skin seemed to echo the grate of the barbed wire'

"C'mon… you don't have to be religious. They've got lots of cultural activities. And it's so close to home. It'd be good for you to meet new people."

Dina had spent a lot of time at the synagogue as a member of the youth group, as a camper and later a counsellor. It was so familiar that she found it difficult to see it as her mother saw it – a threatening place. But any unfamiliar place was a threatening place for Barbara.

"Yes, I'll check what they have. Maybe I pick up a brochure next week."

They both knew their lines well.

"I heard there's a concert at the synagogue. We could go together."

"I don't want to hear a klezmer band."

"Why are you so negative? I haven't even told you what it is yet."

Dina got up to take her son, Mark, out of his high chair and placed him on his grandmother's lap.

"It's a cantor. I heard he has a wonderful voice. You know you're a sucker for a great voice."

"When is this concert?"

"The day after tomorrow. I'll let you know what time."

"Fine," said Barbara, with seeping regret.

Dina arrived at her mother's apartment building just as the concert was starting. Barbara had been waiting in the lobby for 20 minutes.

"It'll be all right," Dina assured her, seeing how anxious she was to enter a darkened auditorium.

"It's only a little concert at the shul. There won't be many people. We'll go in the side entrance. We won't bother anyone. I'll pay Moshe for the tickets on the way out."

This unsettled Barbara even more. Entering without paying? She was lost. Out of her element. In her daughter's hands. She had no choice other than to trust Dina to navigate her through this predicament.

As planned, they slipped in quietly and sat down. Dina relaxed. She turned to her mother expecting her to be relieved, but Barbara was staring hard at the stage. She was taking in the black backdrop and the memorial candles. One corner of the stage was covered in barbed wire. The other had a large piece of black cardboard on which children, who were now filing in from the wings, had written the names of people they'd never known.

Barbara's skin seemed to echo the grate of the barbed wire. Dina realized her mistake. The synagogue was observing Holocaust Remembrance Day, as it did every year. Teenagers stood solemnly on the stage, much like Dina had done herself 10 years ago, though her mother had not come to see her. Dina would have laughed at the mix-up if she had not seen the look on her mother's face.

A lens suddenly focused. Though Dina considered herself informed about the Holocaust, she never thought of it as something her mother had actually experienced. The look in her mother's eyes – eyes that reflected a multitude of untold stories – made the Holocaust more real for her at that moment than any ceremony could.

"If you want, we can just get up and go – simple as that," Dina offered. Her mother did not answer. She simply stared as the children came up, one by one, and read the names of their deceased relatives.

"Henrick Rosenblatt, my mother's grandfather, Sarah Fishenson, my mother's aunt and Yankel, her husband."

"Leo and Hilda Straus, my father's aunt and uncle and their son Shmuel…"

One after another, they gave testimony to nearly forgotten relatives.

"…and my mother's aunt, Freda, and my mother's uncle…"

"… my mother's grandfather, Isaac…"

Barbara sat transfixed by the proceedings. She followed every word, every nuance, as though making up for the attention she hadn't paid to Holocaust books and films, ceremonies and conversations – all so carefully avoided. Now, she was both fully there, yet somewhere else entirely.

"Joseph Cohen, my father's brother, Lea Cohen, my…"

Dina saw that her mother was watching, so she sat back to follow the proceedings. When the reading of the names finished, the sought-after cantor was introduced and appeared on stage.

He was a formidable man, wide-shouldered, bearded. He began to sing a memorial prayer. The roundness of his voice enveloped the listeners.

"Let us remember the six million…"

Barbara felt as if she could reverberate in resonance with his song.

"… to find eternal rest and…"

She could lose herself entirely, cease to exist outside his voice…

"…the holy and the pure of heart who met their deaths…"

"No," Barbara whispered.

"Let us remember the holy and the pure. The holy and the pure…"

"It's not right." Her eyes opened wide.

"Shhhh, what's not right?" Dina asked.

"No, it must not be said," Barbara continued, raising her voice. All heads turned to look at her, but for once she did not care.

"No. You must correct this. Stop!" Barbara shouted, standing up. Dina put her arm around her mother and tried to lead her out of the auditorium, but she would not have any of it.

'Do holy and pure tell jokes and make jam?'

Some members of the audience gave inquisitive looks, but most flashed nasty stares as though to say, "What right do you have?" Barbara was now advancing towards the stage.

The rabbi was moving in her direction, the cantor was reduced to a hesitant mumble.

"No, they were not saints. They were not holy," she cried out with a voice 50 years silent.

"I know! I was there!" she yelled to an old man whose arm she clutched for balance.

"They were people! People! The Nazis made them not people, but I know, I saw, I know they were not holy," she said to a woman who stared indignantly.

The rabbi tried to direct her out of the room but Barbara would not be directed.

"They read," she shouted, "and they spat and they played the cello and some smelled – yes, even before the war, and they argued and they loved each other, and sometimes they loved before the marriage, and they made laundry and jam. They always made jam in the spring. Do holy and pure make laundry?" she asked the cantor.

"Do holy and pure tell jokes and make jam?" she asked the rabbi.

He did not hear her cry. He was surveying the audience for a doctor.

'The world had become a less frightening place'

"Do they?" she questioned, now poking a finger in the direction of the cantor. "Do they? Because," she said, now speaking in little over a whisper as she collapsed into Dina's arms, "if they are not people, then you can do anything to them, can't you? And they did – yes, I was there. In the camp they were not people, only skin and bones, skin and bones – holy, yes, holy…" she continued in a barely audible voice.

"Let me take you home," said Dina.

Barbara allowed herself to be ushered out, and a greatly abridged version of the ceremony continued without her. The cantor restarted his prayer after they left. No one in the room understood what Barbara had said. They were too taken aback by the passion of the outburst.

After what was referred to as "the incident" – when it was referred to at all – Barbara started going out of her apartment more often. The world had become a less frightening place. She even told Dina to stop doing her shopping for her. Mostly, she spent a lot more time with her grandson.

"And here is another big, big strawberry for you. Sweet boy," she said to her grandson.

"When I was little, everyone made jam at home. Bread too. Everyone thought making jam was hard work, but Dina, she loved it. We would eat half the fruit before we put in the jam. Oh yes, Marky, you would have loved my sister, Dina. She has the same name as your mother. Your Mummy was named after her, you know. Now help me to put all the strawberries into this big, big pot."

The Passover Dishes

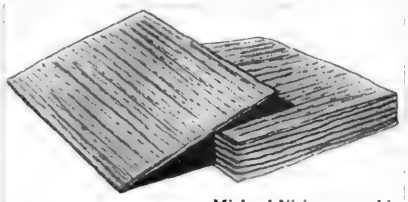
By MIRIAM PRESZOW WEINER

I can remember at the age of three standing on a chair at the sink in Mrs. Soifer's kitchen. This was where I would help my mother wash and dry all the Passover dishes in preparation for the seder night.

My parents had rented a room in Mrs. Soifer's house. We were only permitted kitchen privileges on Friday nights and religious holidays. All other times, we would have to eat in a small corner of the room my parents had rented.

The room was simple. It had a double bed where we all slept. Beside the bed was a counter with a small sink, and on the floor stood a small ice box. We had a small table and four chairs in the far corner of the room. This was where we would eat all our meals, often by candlelight, in order to save electricity. Mrs. Soifer was very strict about that.

My parents were Holocaust survivors. They arrived in Halifax harbour by boat with my brother and me back in 1950. Shortly thereafter, we travelled to Montreal and moved in with Mrs. Soifer. Daddy would often tell me the story of how all he had was five dollars in his pocket the day we arrived. They had also somehow managed to save a few precious belongings, which they had buried somewhere in Poland during their flight from the Nazis. Among the belongings were the Passover dishes and my father's treasured cup for Eliyahu.



Michael Nisimov graphic

That week, the Passover holidays were upon us, and it was my special job to help Mummy get the dishes ready for the seder night. I stood there and ever so carefully wiped dry each special, treasured dish. Being new immigrants, we did not have many material possessions, but at Passover time, when the treasured dishes graced our seder table, we all felt like royalty. The dishes were so beautiful. They had a pure white background, trimmed with pink, blue and purple Victorian roses.

Passover was my favourite holiday. After Daddy made all the brachahs, broke the matzah, hid the afikoman, and we asked the Four Questions, we could begin the Passover meal.

First came the eggs in salt water, placed in little bowls so we could mash them and turn it into egg soup. Then came the sweet gefilte fish in broth, again in little bowls, so we could dip the matzah. The horseradish always added a touch of zest and opened our nostrils. Then came the chicken soup with matzah balls. I felt like a real princess, sitting on a chair that had a soft pillow for extra comfort on the seder night, sipping the matzah ball soup out of those royal dishes. The roasted chicken and brisket, with potato kugel, which was always an extra special treat, tasted even more special when they were served on the Passover dishes. The dessert, fruit compote, was served in small dessert bowls, and on the side was a piece of Mummy's homemade sponge cake.

I loved the Passover seder, and my favourite part was welcoming Eliyahu the Passover prophet. It was my job to open the door as my dad would finish reading the Haggadah. Daddy always filled Eliyahu's cup to the rim. The cup had a beautiful hand-painted chicken and rooster on it. My brother Gerry and I would keep our eyes focused on the cup, to see if we could catch a glimpse of Eliyahu taking a sip. It was simply magical. The table always trembled, and the rim of the cup always seemed to drip ever so slightly.

After dessert, my brother and I would always search for the afikoman so we could get a prize. My brother, who was four years older than me, was always the first one to find it. I didn't care, because I was the one who got to help Mummy wash the Passover dishes.

Last year, my brother's mother-in-law passed away after a lengthy illness. I went to Montreal that week to be with the family. My mother, who was living in a seniors' residence, came to the shivah every day and stayed until way after the evening prayers. I stayed an extra day, as it was my birthday. My brother and mother and I drove to the cemetery to see my dad and other family members who were now long gone. Later that day, my brother and mother dropped me off at the train station. We hugged and kissed, and I got on the train.

One week later, one day before Chanukah, in her 90th year, Mummy passed away. She had her lunch, sat down in her chair to watch TV, and went to sleep. The rabbi said she passed like a righteous soul, with a kiss from God.

Passover Greetings

A little girl reads the haggadah at a Passover seder in Israel.

'I leaned against the wall and wept and prayed...'

The Passover dishes were left for me to share with family and generations to come.

Because it was Chanukah, we lit candles every night at the shivah, and to me it was as if the light from the Chanukah candles illuminated her path into the heavens.

Three weeks later, I was to make my first trip to Israel. This trip had been arranged months earlier, and I had waited more than 55 years to make the journey. I had mixed emotions about going.

However, family and friends reassured me that this was the right thing to do, so I made the trip.

I walked to the Wailing Wall on a Sabbath morning in the pouring rain. I left notes that I had prepared the day before. Overwhelmed with emotion, I leaned against the wall and wept and prayed, and wept and prayed, and wept and prayed. I left tears for Mummy and Daddy and other family members we had loved and lost. I left tears of sorrow, and I left tears of joy, and I thanked God for his blessings. I prayed to God to continue to bless us and keep us safe.

Thirty days after Mummy passed on, I made a trip to the ancient holy city of Safed. I entered one of the oldest synagogues in the city. I spoke with the rabbi who was sitting there. I told him the story of how Mummy had passed away. His eyes gleamed at me with awe. He asked me the name of my mother and father, and he made a special prayer, as I lit two candles and placed them with all the other candles, in memory of those who were now gone. I could feel my parents' spirits close to me.

This year, on Rosh Hashanah morning, I took the small silver siddur that Mummy had brought me from Israel the year I got married. I stood outside in the garden and I prayed for God's blessings. When I came in, I went into the kitchen to finish preparing the matzah ball soup that I was bringing to my children's house for dinner. Suddenly, without warning, the kitchen cupboard began to move away from the wall. The cupboard doors began to open, and the dishes started moving. The entire cupboard and all the dishes inside came tumbling down on top of me.

My mother's Passover dishes, which were stored at the top of the cupboard, and my father's wine cup smashed into thousands of pieces. The cupboard sideswiped me and hit the wall behind me, where a hamsa from Israel with a blessing for the house was hanging. My mother's sugar bowl which was still filled with sugar, sprinkled sugar all over me, the kitchen, and parts of the apartment. I suffered a concussion, as well as cuts and bruises and severe trauma.

There must have been angels in the kitchen that Rosh Hashanah day – angels who somehow managed to save me from disaster. It seems as if the dishes were sacrificed for my life.

I have placed all the broken pieces in a box. I cannot part with them, even though they are broken.

The gravy cup and four soup bowls remain intact. This Passover, there will be new dishes for the seder, but the gravy cup will sit on the table as a treasured memory, and the four remaining soup bowls will be filled with matzah ball soup.

Kol Hakavod to the Older Men at Shul

By Andrew Fainer

Kol hakavod to the older men at shul.
They show honour to the Almighty and his creatures…
Well, I love their wisecracks as expressions of affection except when they are not, that they learn with the Rabbi even when they pretend not to,
and that they talk privately to the Almighty in a silent prayer.
They mourn, provide comfort and eat and drink with blessing, whether or not they pronounce one.
Otherwise to be always in His presence if you were always in His presence you'd be like a fish out of water which is why these honourable men swim in shuls.

Swaying Witnesses to Kiddush in tune with its tune
Plucked from the antique Ashkenazi
And seraphic Sephardi repertoire
As braided challah loaves tangle together under cloth

However strong it comes on Havdalah always has the last say
A stretching braided candle whose twist is flamed
Its light reflecting in nail mirrors on fingertips
While its loyal red libation accomplice drips from the same silver cup

Rebecca's Soliloquy

By Rose Romberg

Rebecca's footsteps tread diamond studded grass.

A rare warm April 1st, the threshold of Passover.
Spring awakens maiden season.
Bluebells and trillium weave earth's course canvas, spiced with purple and crimson mushrooms.

Meandering along a gossamer aura beckons her into the mystical woods.
Roaming among ash-dry tree trunks, their spindly arms hang bereft
from winter's cruel bite.
Her hands brush aside scratchy web-like branches.
Bewitched at the haunted setting staged by Nature's stroke.

Homeward bound along the winding trail, Rebecca views an elderly man and woman on a withered bench under a looming willow.
Hands locked, they sit in silence.
A far-away look veils misty eyes.
Thoughts interlaced like the Sabbath challah.
Together, they have tasted the bitter and the sweetness of life.

Rebecca arrives at her sun-bathed flowering garden.
Peeking over the sculptured rocks, delicate faces, violet, yellow-eyed pansies, lavender and white crocus, smile at her.

In a moment of fantasy,
Rebecca envisions a childhood scene.

Momma's Seder Table.
Young happy eyes watch candlelight flicker and dart over Elijah's Koyse brimming ruby-red wine ripple.

Her spirit dances in anticipation soon, to be at the festive Seder Table.

Somewhere

By Pamela Scher

Somewhere in between
The Judean Desert of milk and honey hills,
The smooth stones of the Kinneret,
The melted sapphires of the red sea.

Somewhere in between
The pomegranate mountains of Jordan,
The sunset stains on the Mediterranean,
The laboured Earth, drenched with sweat.

Somewhere in between
The strength of the Golan,
The salty wall of wishes,
The Olive Mount.

Somewhere in between
The saffron of the Negev,
The proud palm trees,
The calm of a Jerusalem night;
I found what I was looking for.

As the wind rippled through the morning,
Standing on two thousand threads of time,
I felt it.
Eternity.

How to make Bubbie Annie's chicken soup

By APRIL LAUFER

Not so very long ago, an announcement appeared in our community newspaper: "Whoever can make the best chicken soup in all the kingdom should come forward."

One by one, young and old, short and tall, thin and fat – I had no doubt that there would be many who would try. Not me.

The notice, titled "Better than Bubbie's Chicken Soup Contest," brought a smile to my face. I had been musing on how I would write the story of my failed efforts at trying to make Bubbie Annie's chicken soup. As far as her grandchildren were concerned, Bubbie Annie made the best chicken soup in the whole world!

"Better than Bubbie's," the contest had challenged. Wow. I had never even contemplated that such an option existed. Even if every chicken soup recipe in the whole land might be shared, would it be possible to find one that was better than Bubbie Annie's?

Before I went back to my writing, I felt a brief pang of conscience. Would I be committing some egregious sin if I wrote about Bubbie Annie's amazing chicken soup?

But then I came up with a solution. I would not reveal her secret ingredient. Of course, I had to discover what that was and I had to do so with great circumspection. After all, how could I tell Annie that though she had told me how to make chicken soup she had not told me how she made her chicken soup?

She might be insulted that I thought she was keeping secrets from me. Hadn't she said I was her favourite daughter-in-law next to her other daughter-in-law? Hadn't she always said not to worry, that she was more than happy preparing chicken soup for my family?

One Sunday morning I showed up at Annie's and told her about the Better than Bubbie's Chicken Soup Contest.

She just smiled her Mona Lisa smile.

"Would you like a tea?" she asked, going over to her kettle and filling it with water. I looked at the announcement that I was holding and then looked at Annie. How far would I be willing to go to find out the secret ingredient that made Bubbie Annie's chicken soup so special?

"Do you want to do this?" I asked waving the newspaper in my hand. She didn't turn around because she was plugging in the kettle. I was sure that she had heard me.

"I'll put out some biscuits to go with our tea," she said as she reached into the cupboard for her favourite wafers.

I walked over to Annie and stood next to her. I pretended to be studying the announcement that was still in my hand. Annie looked at me reading over the contest rules but said nothing.

"I guess you're not interested in the contest," I said, a bit disappointed.

"Why would I be?" Annie asked innocently.

"Well," I began, not wanting to pass up the opportunity, "you know how the kids always say that yours is the best chicken soup in the entire world? Wouldn't it be nice to share your recipe?"

She seemed not to hear me then. The kettle had started to steam and I decided I wouldn't pursue this line of reasoning.

"Tea's ready," she said happily. We sat down, and not another word was said about the contest.

When I got home, I told my husband that his mom wasn't interested in the contest. He looked puzzled.

"I was kind of hoping that she would do it and I would find out what ingredients I was missing, so I could make my chicken soup just as good as hers."

He weighed his words carefully before he spoke.

"Maybe you shouldn't worry about it," he said.

"I'm not worried," I retorted. "I just would like to be able to make chicken soup that tastes as good as Annie's."

"Well you know," he said sheepishly, "Ma did try to show you how to make her kreplach…"

He didn't have to finish the sentence. I never did make Annie's kreplach, even though she had spent a stress-filled two hours trying to show me what to do. I couldn't follow her recipe because she kept saying things like "a handful of flour," and I couldn't figure out what size hand was required. In the end, Annie had had to rummage through her cupboard to find a measuring cup and take her handful of flour and put it in the measuring cup so that I could see exactly how much she meant. I still don't get how a person can say a handful of flour when everyone's hand is a different size.

How could I find out the secret to Annie's amazing chicken soup? She probably didn't even realize that it was a secret, just as she had not realized that when she added a handful of flour to her dough, she just knew exactly how much was needed. If I was ever going to find out how to make Annie's chicken soup I would have to be a little more clever.

For the first several years of my marriage, I never actually bothered to make chicken soup. Every Friday afternoon, Bubbie Annie invited us to come over on the way home from work.

"I'm making you chicken soup," she'd say.

'Bubbie Annie had a magic chicken soup pot'

Who could resist such an offer? Besides, Bubbie Annie's chicken soup came fully packaged with carrots, lokshen and an accompanying potato kugel.

After so many years of enjoying Bubbie Annie's amazing chicken soup, I had the idea that Bubbie Annie had a magic chicken soup pot. Like The Magic Porridge Pot story in the kids' Fairy Tale Treasure book, Bubbie Annie's pot never stopped bubbling and steaming with its wonderful aromatic chicken soup.

Here are the facts behind my enchanted chicken soup pot theory: first of all, Bubbie Annie had brought her chicken soup pot all the way from Czechoslovakia. Secondly, the pot was red on the outside, and everyone knows that red is a magical colour. And thirdly, if you peered into her chicken soup pot, which was quite deep, it had that lived-in look, it had experience. It was clear to me that this pot knew how to make chicken soup.

For the briefest moment, I thought of asking Bubbie Annie if I might borrow her pot

For the briefest moment, I thought of asking Bubbie Annie if I might borrow her pot.

"Well, if you take my pot, how will I make you chicken soup?"

I hadn't meant to say it out loud, but there I was, standing in Bubbie Annie's kitchen, and I had blurted out my request. I sheepishly laughed and then hugged Annie.

"Of course," I said. "I was being silly."

"Do you want me to buy you a stock pot?" she asked.

"No, no," I replied, "I have a pot."

Of course, it wasn't a stock pot but surely it was good enough.

This left me with no other recourse but to pay a visit to Annie and watch her put together all of the ingredients to make her wonderful chicken soup.

I never managed to arrive at the right time. If I promised to come at eight, she had been up earlier and decided to get started a bit earlier. I tried to pin her down to an exact time.

"What if I get there by 7:30?" I asked, calculating whether I could actually get all the kids up and ready for school before I left.

"7:30?" she asked. "You want to come at 7:30? Won't it be too early for you to get up? You'll be tired by the time you get to work."

"Well if I can get there by 7:30, will that be on time to see" I wanted to say to see the magic, but instead I said "how you put in the ingredients?"

Annie laughed.

"You want to see me put the ingredients into the pot?"

She seemed to be amused by my request.

Once again, Annie kindly listed the ingredients that went into making her soup: water, chicken, onion, carrots, parsnip, celery, parsley and dill. Though the list seemed complete I knew that making Bubbie's chicken soup required more than a list of ingredients. Maybe it had to do with the order of the ingredients, or where they were bought; maybe it was the length of time that they had to boil; maybe it was something she added that she didn't even think about because it was just so automatic. Then again, it was just possible that to make Bubbie's famous chicken soup you needed the right genes.

And what was that business about scraping the carrots. Scraping? I knew Bubbie Annie had a peeler; she gave it to Zayde Sam when they were making potato kugel, and he sat at the kitchen table with newspapers and peeled away. But for her chicken soup, Annie scraped the carrots.

After a very lacklustre effort, one Friday, I called Annie and complained that I was pretty sure that I had followed her recipe, but my chicken soup just didn't have the same rich taste as hers.

"It's okay," she said, "I'm happy to make it for you."

That should have been more than good enough, but I really thought I should try and take advantage of having the expert at hand.

On my way to work the following Friday, I stopped at Annie's to see if I could pick up any additional tips. It was 7:30 a.m. As usual, the door was wide open because of all the cooking that was taking place. I opened the screen door to find Annie standing in front of her magic chicken soup pot. She had little beads of perspiration on her forehead. She was dipping a ladle into the soup pot and taking a little sip. She seemed to be pondering what to do when I interrupted her.

"Oh," she turned as I announced my presence. "I didn't hear you come in."

The perspiration was now forming on her brow, which had creased into a frown. She recovered quickly and gave me a smile.

"I thought I might come by and get a few extra tips."

I stood next to her and peered into the pot. She put her ladle down on the counter, put her arm on my shoulder and steered me towards the kitchen table.

"Can I make you a coffee?" she asked.

With a bit of sulk, I replied, "No, that's okay. I guess I should get going."

"Okay," she said cheerfully as she walked me to the door. "The soup will be ready for you after work."

I thanked her and kissed her goodbye, and then she closed the door. As I walked down the stairs, it occurred to me that she never cooks with the door closed. I had the fleeting feeling that if only I could sneak back in at that very moment I would find the answer I was seeking. I looked at my watch. I had a couple of minutes to spare. Should I turn around and go back upstairs? I would have to see if the door was unlocked, and then what would I say? I have time for that coffee? And what would she do if I peered into her pot again? Not a good idea. I went to work.

I finally began to feel that my whole effort had been a mistake. Secret ingredients? Enchanted soup pot?

Young and old, short and tall, thin and fat, each may try, but for as long as Bubbie Annie makes her family chicken soup, we will happily proclaim, "Bubbie Annie, you make the best chicken soup in the whole, entire world."

And truthfully, isn't that exactly as it should be?

Poland

By Stanley Weisberg

Weep no more
Your blooded tears
Your dead sons
Have no fears

Speak no more
Of Poland's foes
You have forgotten
But God still knows

Bleed no more for your Hebrew cousins
Three million souls
Ripped from your bosom

Nine hundred years
For what it's worth
Jews lived and toiled
On Poland's earth

Nine hundred years
We were Polish sons
Yet, you let us die
By German guns

Once we were millions
On the Polish plain
Only five thousand
Now remain

Do not think
That time erases
Memories of those camps
Those killing places

Seven camps within Europe's girth
And all seven placed

A rose garden I did not walk
Children's thrills I knew not.

A boyhood I lived but happiness I sought
Getting through the day was my only thought.

I walked a road burning beneath my feet.
Slumped in a pit Warsaw Ghetto retreat.

When the night came to a close
I dreaded the morning coming.

Trains rolling and puffing all day long
People like cattle to slaughter bound.

Treblinka Auschwitz, there stops the train
Lives extinguished no more pain.

Smoke and ashes blowing in the wind
Eclipse the sun stain the moon.

Silenced forever child's cry mother's plea
Echo in the valley resounding into eternity.

Nothing but a miracle can save my day
Postpone my demise come what may.

And amid the horrors of the Holocaust
As the world kept silent and hope was lost

On the Shores far away on the beaches of Normandy

The sun is breaking, broken hearts again smiling.

A new life emerging out of ruins and pain
Six Million perished just memories remain.

From the Nazi inferno to the Land of the free

Suicide bomber strikes in Tel Aviv

Jerusalem Post

TEL AVIV — The prevailing Pesach calm was destroyed shortly after 1:30 p.m. Monday afternoon when a suicide bombing rocked Tel Aviv's Neve Sha'anan neighbourhood.

At least nine people were reported killed, not including the suicide bomber, and at least 60 wounded, 15 seriously, as a result of the blast.

This was the second suicide attack to take place at the restaurant Falafel Rosh Ha'ir. Islamic Jihad and the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades claimed responsibility for the attack in a video released to Palestinian television.

An eyewitness said that he had seen a security guard stop and search a young man's bag at the entrance to the falafel stand just prior to the blast.

One of the restaurant's owners told Channel 2 that he had seen the bomber scuffle with a security guard, then detonate the explosive device just outside the restaurant.

Interim Prime Minister Ehud Olmert responded to the first terror attack of his short tenure by saying: "We will know how to respond. We know what to do."

Harper condemns Iranian threats

OTTAWA — Prime Minister Stephen Harper has strongly condemned the latest threats to Israel made by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

At the opening of a three-day conference in Tehran in support of the Palestinians last Friday, Ahmadinejad called Israel a "permanent threat" to the Middle East that will soon be eradicated, and he questioned the validity of the Holocaust. "The Zionist regime is a rotten, dried tree that will be eliminated by one storm," Ahmadinejad said.

"Canada vigorously condemns the recent call by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for the annihilation of Israel, and his continued denial of the Holocaust," Harper said in a statement on Saturday. "The Canadian people reject the hatred that underlies such appalling and irresponsible statements.

"It is particularly disturbing that these remarks are being made at a time when Iran is in serious violation of its international obligations with respect to nuclear non-proliferation.

"Canada continues to believe that these outrageous comments by the president of Iran do not reflect the traditions and values of the Iranian people," Harper said.

Israel responds to rocket barrage from Gaza

Firing from within heavily populated civilian areas in Gaza, Palestinian terrorists have launched a campaign of Qassam rocket fire against Israel. Since April 1, more than 60 rockets have been fired into Israel. In response, the Israel Defence Forces has stepped up ground, naval and aerial assaults near populated areas from where, the army says, the Qassams are being fired. Twelve Palestinians have been killed or wounded in the IDF responses, and some Palestinians have urged the Palestinian Authority to stop the attacks on Israel. The head of the IDF planning directorate, Maj.-Gen. Yitzhak Harel, told the Jerusalem Post that Israel needs to continue escalating its response while severing all ties with the Hamas-run PA. "Eventually, there will be no Qassam fire," he said. [Isranet photo]

The News in Brief

CANADA

El Al Case Dismissed

TORONTO — The Ontario Court of Justice has dismissed a claim against El Al Israel Airlines by the former operator of a travel agency that specialized in travel to Israel. The judge said none of Shalom Even's rights were violated when El Al informed Even's employers they would cease to do business with them if they employed him. The court said El Al had legitimate concerns about dealing with a firm that hired Even, since his former company, Shalom K Tours, went bankrupt owing El Al $688,000, and Even breached an agreement to hold funds collected for tickets in trust.

Portus Heads Warned

TORONTO — The co-founders of hedge fund Portus Alternative Asset Management were warned by their own lawyers they might be violating Ontario Securities Commission rules up to a year before the firm failed, according to court documents filed last week by KPMG, Portus' receiver, Bloomberg News reported. As well, Boaz Manor and Michael Mendselson took in $500 million in assets even after their lawyer told them to stop because of concerns about fictitious trading records, money laundering and "further criminal problems," the Globe and Mail reported. Manor fled to Israel in March 2005 after the OSC forced Portus into receivership. He has yet to account for $800 million in Portus assets. He and Mendelson deny any wrongdoing

Passport Challenge

WINNIPEG — A Winnipeg court heard arguments last week in the case of a Toronto teen who is seeking to change Ottawa's policy of not allowing Israel to be noted on passports of citizens born in Jerusalem. Last year, Eliayahu Veffer, 18, launched a challenge to the policy, which doesn't allow Israel to be listed because, as federal lawyers said last week, Ottawa contends Jerusalem's status has been in dispute since 1948. But Veffer's lawyer, David Matas, said that with the exception of Jerusalem, when a city is in disputed territory, Canada lets passport applicants choose which country to list, CBC News reported.

WORLD

Hamas Visas Denied

PARIS — France has denied visas to two Hamas lawmakers. The Hamas members were invited to talks with the Council of Europe, a leading European human rights group. Last month, the group invited members of Israel's Knesset and the Palestinian Legislative Council, including the Hamas members, to its headquarters in Strasbourg for a meeting to promote dialogue. France is a member of the European Union, which has declared Hamas a terrorist organization.

Nazi Item Pulled

LOS ANGELES — A body marker from a Nazi concentration camp was removed from an auction in Los Angeles after complaints from a Jewish group. Los Angeles County removed the item from Dachau from a public-estate auction following complaints from the Simon Wiesenthal Center, which was alerted to the item by a woman who saw it listed on an auction website. The item reportedly was in a collection that included pre-World War II Prussian uniforms and Soviet-era statues of Lenin.

Interfaith Study

NEW YORK — Fewer than one-fifth of non-Jews who marry U.S Jews convert, a new study says. The American Jewish Committee report also found some 30 per cent of parents who convert reluctantly instil ambivalence toward Judaism in their kids, while 30 per cent of converts are active Jews. The study interviewed 94 mixed-marriage couples and nine Jewish professionals who work with interfaith families.

Doggone Seder

CHICAGO — A second annual Passover seder for dogs was held at Soggie Paws, an upscale pet store in Chicago. The dogs "sat content and still with tiny yarmulkes on their heads," the store said.

Google Buys Israeli's Search Technology

SAN FRANCISCO — Google has acquired an advanced text search algorithm developed by an Israeli man when he was a doctoral student in computer science at the University of New South Wales in Australia, Ha'aretz reported.

Ori Alon

Ori Alon developed the Internet search algorithm, called Orion, which answers a search by producing only the most relevant textual results. It also generates a list of topics directly related to the original search.

"For example, if you search for information on [Israel's] War of Independence, you'll receive a list of related worlds, like Etzel, Palmach, Ben-Gurion," he said last year.

Alon now works at Google's Mountain View, Calif., offices. The search engine company didn't divulge what it paid him for his search enhancement software.

Board of rabbis withdraws from Yom Hashoah event

Protests refusal to allow girls to sing in the choir

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Board of Rabbis (TBR), comprising mainly Conservative and Reform clergy, said it won't take part in, or endorse, this year's community-wide Yom Hashoah commemoration after organizers decided the full Renanim Youth Choir can't sing at the event because the group has both boys and girls.

This year, for the first time, organizers decided to invite the Renanim choir to take part in the annual event, but only with its male singers. The decision was made out of deference to the Vaad Harabonim, the umbrella for some 70 Orthodox rabbis, in order to respect the traditional prohibition against men hearing women sing (kol isha).

The six-year-old choir is two-thirds female and its 25 members range in age from 10 to 18.

Although there are no formal, written guidelines for the event – to be held April 24 at Earl Bales Park – female clergy, female soloists and mixed choirs have not been on the program in past years.

Organizers want everyone in the community to feel comfortable, event co-chair Louis Greenbaum said.

Both rabbinic groups, along with about a dozen other organizations, have been longtime co-sponsors of the Holocaust Community Commemoration, which is facilitated by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The TBR, whose approximately 40 affiliated rabbis are mostly Reform and Conservative, voted unanimously this month to withdraw its support from this year's event, said Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich, who will succeed Rabbi Daniel Gottlieb as president June 1.

"I think the exclusion of children is particularly painful, because children's voices were silenced in the Holocaust," said Rabbi Gottlieb, who was on the event's steering committee. He said the program, as it stands, does not "reflect the community," and that although he has asked for the inclusivity issue to be looked at in the past, it has not happened.

He said families who observe Judaism in an egalitarian way "feel excluded by communal programs that don't reflect their values. These are the values of the overwhelming majority of the affiliated community."

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, who represents the Vaad on the steering committee, said not having women sing has been "the understanding" in the past so that the Vaad can endorse the program and the "average pious Jew" can feel comfortable attending.

"We all have different beliefs. We try to make our shuls handicap-accessible. We try to be as inclusive as we can in a lot of different areas," Rabbi Tradburks said.

Likewise, he noted – as did Greenbaum and Morris Zbar, a senior vice-president of the federation – that organizers of the Yom Hashoah event have felt that it's important to make their commemoration inclusive.

The commemoration, which Greenbaum believes is the largest of its kind in the Diaspora, began about a decade ago after Jehudi Kinar, then Israel's consul general in Toronto, approached the federation about organizing a community-wide event. Last year, more than 2,200 people attended.

"The idea here is to create an event that everybody can go to," said Greenbaum, who represents the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem at the event. "It's not a religious event, but it's a solemn commemoration."

Kinar "felt it was important for the community to be united in memorializing the Holocaust," said Zbar, recalling the variety of commemorative events that existed at the time.

But, at least this year, the community is not united.

"There are things we [Orthodox] try to participate in on a community basis, but they're becoming fewer," said Rabbi Tradburks, who noted there are other federation-sponsored community events he won't attend because they have female singers.

Art for Israel's sake

From the editor's desk

We should constantly remind ourselves how remarkable have been Israel's achievements and contributions for the betterment of mankind.

The constant emphasis in media and other circles of the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians necessarily casts our attention away from the Jewish state's many leading-edge discoveries and inventions in every scientific sphere.

Moreover, the ubiquitous, attendant false imagery of the Palestinian "David" struggling heroically against the Israeli "Goliath" further dims the meagre light that might otherwise shine a brighter spotlight on Israel's agricultural, biomedical, engineering, aeronautical and other advancements.

But among the long list of widely overlooked Israeli achievements, the most overlooked area is, perhaps, its uniquely inspiring fine art.

In his seminal work One Hundred Years of Art in Israel (Westview Press, 1998), Gideon Ofrat wrote: "The Israeli art world is amazingly rich and intense, regardless of its location far away from the attention of the western art centres; regardless of the absence of an avant-garde art market, regardless of the paucity of art journals and publications. It is a highly diverse art world, one with an excitable Mediterranean temperament."

In trying to paint with more precise strokes, he described Israeli fine art as "the art of a small place, one rich in landscapes and variegated in climate, torn between the mentality of a 'manhattanized' Tel Aviv and a 'sanctified' Jerusalem, a place located in the Middle East but with its heart set firmly in the West."

Ofrat noted, as has every historian of Israeli art, that "the art in modern Israel dates back to 1906 when the Bezalel School of Arts and Crafts was founded in Jerusalem," the dream child of painter and sculptor Boris Schatz.

Schatz and his colleagues tried to combine a pragmatic desire to help boost commerce related to arts and crafts for people who lived in Jerusalem. He was also motivated by the idealistic aspiration to help foster a local, indigenous art of the pioneering, Jewish soul that was newly forming with the lore, history and traditions of the Holy Land.

Israel has come a long and exciting way in all aspects of individual and societal development from the early pioneering days of the last century. And so, too, has the development of its art from those formative first struggles of Schatz and his colleagues at the Bezalel 100 years ago.

In the coming weeks, readers will have the opportunity to view first-hand the extent to which a unique Israeli art has developed since Schatz opened the doors to his own pioneering school.

Israel ArtSource Fine Art, an umbrella organization of Israeli art galleries, most of which have some 30 years of commercial experience in art sales, will be bringing the works of some of Israel's most exciting artists, new and established, for special viewing in Toronto.

Established in 2005 with the support of the Ministry of Industry, Israel ArtSource's mission is to foster awareness in North America of Israeli fine art and fine artists. It features original paintings and sculptures of more than 70 artists including Israeli masters such as Judith Yellin, Menashe Kadishman, Moshe Castel and Nachum Gutman as well as relative newcomers such as Zina Roitman and Adriana Naveh.

The styles, subjects and themes of the works are as varied as are the creative, intense imaginations of the many exciting artists whose works the organization represents.

The CJN recently met with Ehud Dar, the manager of Israel ArtSource Fine Art, to discuss the upcoming Toronto exhibition. It is part of a three-city tour. Chicago and New York are the other two stops.

Dar pointed out that, indeed, the organization's primary motivation is commercial success. But it is far from the only motivation. Israel ArtSource, he emphasized, is intent on showcasing Israeli artists to the West. It strives "to give a boost to new artists." In particular, he mentioned the artists who have emigrated from the former Soviet Union and who continue to develop their art in the Israeli artistic environment.

Buying a work of art by an Israeli artist, Dar said to me, "is a way for your readers to bring a bit of Israel into their homes."

The Israel ArtSource exhibitions take place in Toronto May 2 and 3 at the Koffler Centre of the Arts, Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, 4588 Bathurst Street and from May 4 to 8 at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre, South Building, Room 802.

ART AND SOUL

Baycrest residents, some of whom have never done any type of artwork, are seen with the ceramic pieces they created in the centre's therapeutic recreation centre, under the guidance of Brenda Lass, a creative arts worker. Thirty-five of their pieces were sold at Baycrest's annual fundraiser, Art and Soul, last month. Others are donated to the Baycrest store, and the money received goes back into the program. "This puts the artists in the position of giving back to Baycrest," says Lass. Seen here, clockwise from top left are: Esther Kalifon, Max Cainer, Sarah Kagan and Morris Reiss.

Cantors group to remain as sponsors

Despite the dispute, "we remain committed to the vision of a single community-wide commemoration, but it has to reflect the community. We hope the matter will be resolved," Rabbi Gottlieb said.

"If there is any possible way to arrive at a scenario where both [groups] feel comfortable, that's what we would do," Greenbaum said. "The event will go on. It's very meaningful, very important."

The Toronto Council of Hazzanim, which consists of 34 Conservative, Orthodox and Reform cantors – including women – considered following the TBR's lead, but remained as a sponsor and participating group after one executive member said it would not be right to pull out at such a late date, said Marshall Loomer, the group's president.

Greenbaum noted that, although females do not sing at the community event, there are females on the program. The keynote speaker this year is a woman, Sara Ginaite-Rubinson, a former partisan, he said. Also, females will read names of those who perished, and there will be female students in the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's presentation.

Ironically, the Renanim choir's "whole purpose" is to unite the community, said its director Susan Michaels. Her choir members – eight boys and 17 girls – range from observant to unaffiliated, she said. "And everybody gets along."

The choir will be taking part in another commemorative Yom Hashoah ceremony, the Megillah Hashoah reading at Adath Israel Congregation on Apr. 23.

But when Michaels received a call this past winter inviting the males to take part in the community commemoration, she said she had mixed feelings.

As a child of Holocaust survivors, she "profoundly wanted" to participate because she felt the music could provide catharsis and healing, but she didn't want to exclude some of her singers.

"We have eight boys. That would mean two thirds of my choir would not be singing. What is that saying to my girls?"

Michaels said she feels like she's in the eye of the storm.

But the rabbis involved spoke cordially of each other. "This is not 'bad blood,'" said Rabbi Flanzraich.

A statement released last week by federation spokesperson Howard English said his organization "will continue to pursue common ground between the two rabbinic bodies and then determine, in consultation with community leaders, the role of UJA Federation in facilitating future community-wide Yom Hashoah programs."

Iran's commitment to genocide

Last week was a busy one for Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. On Tuesday, he announced that Iran had, for the first time, successfully enriched uranium. It was coded language for all who understand his dangerous game, announcing that his government was well on its way to producing a nuclear weapon.

On Friday, he addressed the opening of a three-day conference in Tehran in support of the Palestinians' struggle against Israel. Many members of the new ruling Hamas elite of the Palestinian Authority participated. Ahmadinejad used the occasion to impart yet another of his menacing messages to the Jewish state and the West, belligerence against both of which appears to constantly obsess him and to steer his dysfunctional, amoral compass.

"The land of Palestine will be freed soon," Ahmadinejad told the attentive audience of some 900 adoring, hopeful listeners. "The existence of [the Israeli] regime is a permanent threat [to the Middle East]. Its existence has harmed the dignity of Islamic nations."

"Like it or not," the Iranian president ghoulishly added, "the Zionist regime is heading toward annihilation. The Zionist regime is a rotten, dried tree that will be eliminated by one storm."

One need hardly possess a high-octane imagination to decipher the malevolent meaning of Ahmadinejad's metaphor, "one storm." He is racing, with a marathoner's single-minded focus, to marry his hateful obsession with nuclear weapons capability.

According to a high-ranking officer from the Israel Defence Forces' military intelligence who spoke recently to the Jerusalem Post, Iran has developed a two-track nuclear program. Alongside and parallel to its publicly identified, purportedly civilian, nuclear track program, it is developing a separate track for nuclear arms.

"It is more probable that they have a second and secret plan [to develop nuclear arms] and they will copy the technology they are now developing in the open and use it in a secret location," the officer said.

If Ahmadinejad's earlier announcement regarding his scientists' successful enrichment of uranium is true, the urgency of intervening in his race to hell has heightened to a considerable degree.

Iran will not voluntarily abandon its development of weapons-grade nuclear material. It must be made to stop. Western nations must act now while, in theory at least, there are still non-military options available to try to get Ahmadinejad to quit his mad drive.

In complete violation of and utter contempt for the United Nations charter, one member state, Iran, repeatedly threatens the annihilation of a fellow member state, Israel. It is as eerie as it is bizarre. The UN Security Council must begin the process of imposing meaningful, effective, unbreakable sanctions on Iran. It must do so, not only to ensure the future of the United Nations, but of far greater importance – to save the world from a nuclear nightmare.

Reporting 'egging' to police

We live close to where the "egging" that was reported by The CJN occurred and have experienced two such incidents in the year we have been in the neighbourhood ("Toronto family's mezuzah egged by vandals," April 6). The second was likely on the same day as the one you mentioned in your article. The two involving our house appeared to probably have our door as a target (although one shot missed completely). We are not convinced that these incidents are anything other than the idiotic acts of the usual suspects. Our next-door neighbours who are not Jewish and do not have a mezuzah on their door were also hit and, as luck would have it, their shot was perhaps close to where a mezuzah might have been.

Clearly, many anti-Semitic incidents do occur in Toronto and it is sensible to be vigilant. However, some care should be taken before assuming that every act of vandalism qualifies. The multiple hits suffered by the Browns on their mezuzah may have been nothing more than fortuitous "good grouping" by the perpetrator. Nevertheless, it certainly does not hurt to report these incidents to police in the event a pattern emerges. As a result of your article, we will report our experience as an act of vandalism and let the police draw their own conclusions.

Hillel aims to engage the 'disengaged'

In response to the letter "Students 'disengaged' from communal life" (CJN, March 30), it's important to point out that the major reason why Hillel International conducted the millennial study was to find out what the disengaged population was saying. In Toronto, Hillel takes the responsibility of engaging students so seriously that we have replicated the American study. Our goal is to find out what Canadian Jewish students in general and Toronto students in particular have to say.

As did Hillel in the United States, we will follow up on the findings of this research by holding meetings with focus groups comprising the many different student viewpoints reflected in the study. We want to ensure that all legitimate voices are heard and that they can access the appropriate gateways to connect with Jewish life in this city.

Hillel of Greater Toronto regards, as its major mission, being attentive to the voices of all students and being inclusive and welcoming. Engaging the "disengaged" is a primary goal, one to which all levels of the organization are committed.

David Rosenbaum
President, Hillel of Greater Toronto

Israeli policy puts Jewish lives at risk

I don't know why Abe Zubatoff feels he has to misrepresent our sincere and reasoned objections to the government of Israel's policies toward the Palestinians, and claim they're based on some trivial desire to avoid the "embarrassment" of Diaspora Jews, even at the risk of endangering Israel's existence ("Embarrassing Diaspora Jews," letter, CJN, April 6).

If we thought that these policies were in any way necessary to preserve Israel's existence, we'd put up with a lot more than embarrassment.

But we believe deeply that the reverse is true, that the recklessness, lawlessness and cruelty of recent Israeli government policy puts Jewish lives and futures at risk all over the world, including in Israel, and also undermines the stature of Judaism and the ideals on which the State of Israel was founded.

Does he deny our stake in Israel and our responsibilities to it? Does he think we fulfil them by burying our heads in the sand? Is that his idea of a concerned Jew – Canadian or otherwise?

Bought into Palestinian propaganda

The debate between the Alliance of Concerned Jewish Canadians and their critics seems to revolve mostly around whether or not they have the right to speak against Israeli government actions. While I don't dispute that right, I am seriously concerned about the reaction the alliance may provoke among Israel's enemies and critics. There are many individuals and organizations that will pounce upon their proclamation and trumpet the fact that if Jews, of all people, are disavowing the actions of the Israeli government, those actions must be truly terrible. Again, I don't dispute the alliance's right to criticize, but I do object to the fact that they are doing it so broadly and that their statements demonstrate no real knowledge of why the Israeli government acts the way it does. Instead of taking the time to truly understand the history, they've bought into Palestinian propaganda and now risk giving it even more weight in a world that is already hostile enough.

The 500th anniversary of the Lisbon Massacre

By RICHARD ZIMLER

Precisely 500 years ago, on April 19, 1506, the Lisbon Massacre began. At the time, the Portuguese capital was a dusty, disease-ridden city wasted by plague and drought. Just off the main square, in St. Dominic's Church, priests decided to restore the demoralized residents' faith in God's mercy. That morning, they apparently carved a niche at the back of a large crucifix. During mass, they put a candle inside so that the glow of the flame would show through, declaring the radiance a miracle.

Richard Zimler

As the story goes, among the worshippers was a man who called out that rain would be a far more useful miracle. This daring but foolhardy churchgoer happened to be a New Christian – a Jewish convert to Roman Catholicism. Thousands of New Christians lived in Lisbon at the time because King Manuel had ordered all Portuguese Jews to be forcibly converted to Christianity nine years earlier. Their only other choice had been death.

The worshipper who was foolish enough to criticize the priestly ruse in St. Dominic's Church that day was immediately seized, and outraged members of the congregation soon chopped off his head. Furious Dominican priests subsequently led a mob out to the streets, inciting them to riot, with calls for "Death to the Jews and heretics!"

Most of the former Jews had moved their faith into the shadows by then: in public, they professed to be good Catholics, but in their own homes – behind closed curtains and locked doors – they practised their traditional religion. On April 19, most of them would have been celebrating Passover.

As the crazed crowd rampaged through the traditional Jewish quarters of the city, they burst into New Christian homes and murdered anyone they could capture. Over the course of three days of rioting, they dragged the victims' bodies to the Rossio, the square that is still at the heart of the Portuguese capital, and burned them in two enormous pyres.

Contemporaneous accounts tell us that "Northern sailors" paid for the wood to burn the bodies. They do not mention the stench of charring human flesh, but I'd imagine that no one in Lisbon that day would ever forget it.

Some historians say the death toll was as high as 4,000, but most estimates centre around a figure of 2,000. In any case, given that the Jewish population of the city was probably not more than 10,000, virtually every Jewish family would have lost a loved one that day.

I first read about the Lisbon Massacre in 1989, by which time I'd been to Portugal several times to visit friends, and it shocked me that none of them knew anything about the pogrom. I soon discovered, too, that it wasn't mentioned in school textbooks. The massacre had been erased from collective memory. It was as if the Jews who had been murdered in April 1506 had never lived.

Feeling outraged, I decided to make the Lisbon Massacre the background for the novel I was then planning about a 16th-century Portuguese artist. This tragic event fit perfectly into my objectives as a writer, since one of my aims has always been to give a voice to people who have been systematically silenced. I take pride in crafting stories that force us to remember events that many people would prefer to forget.

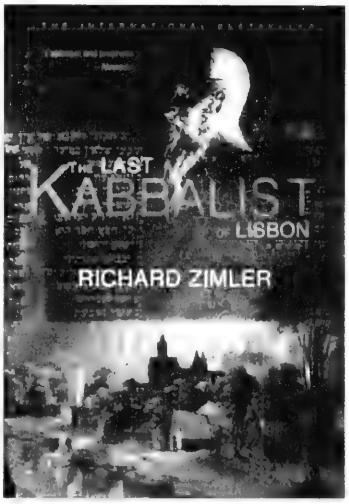
The novel I was then planning turned into The Last Kabbalist of Lisbon, which tells the story of Berekiah Zarco, a bright and studious young New Christian who lives through the Lisbon Massacre, only to discover that his beloved Uncle Abraham, his spiritual mentor, has been murdered in the family cellar. Berekiah must track down the killer. As a kabbalist interested in the symbolic meaning of events, he also tries to interpret what the pogrom means for him, his family, the Jewish people, all of humanity and even God's Upper Realms. Berekiah gives his interpretation on the last page of the novel, and it is a reading of events that gives the previous 300 pages of the book a poignant and chilling new meaning.

In my subsequent novels, Hunting Midnight and Guardian of the Dawn, I've written about other dramatic and little-known events in Sephardi Jewish history, including the imposition of the Inquisition in Goa, India. Indeed, my aim has been to create a Sephardi cycle, a series of independent novels – to be read in any order – about different branches and generations of Berekiah Zarco's family.

A few months ago, after I reminded one of Portugal's Jewish leaders about the upcoming 500th anniversary of the massacre, the Lisbon Jewish community decided to hold a commemoration ceremony on April 29. As that date approaches, I've been thinking about why we ought to remember the 2,000 Jews murdered five centuries ago.

For anyone who believes that we learn from history, the answer is obvious: we should commemorate the massacre in order to prevent such murderous outbreaks of religious and ethnic hatred from happening again. For practising Jews, another reason is provided by Judaism's extraordinary emphasis on remembrance. Every Passover, for instance, we re-enact the Hebrews' flight from Egypt to the Promised Land. We do this, I think, not just to feel ourselves linked to our forefathers and bound to God, but also to remind ourselves that we are exactly like the people who have come before us.

Although both of these reasons once seemed entirely valid to me, I now have my doubts. Having recently turned 50, and no longer as optimistic as I was as a young man, I've come to believe that only a few of us learn anything valuable from history. And I've lately begun to suspect, too, that in remembering our forefathers – in feeling ourselves part of a tightly knit Jewish community – we may tend to exclude people of other ethnicities and religions, even when it comes time to help them fight against violent oppression.



It's when I open my morning newspaper and read about yet one more bombing in Iraq and more attacks in Israel and Palestine-to-be – just to choose two obvious examples – that I become convinced that we are largely deaf to the voices of our ancestors. And even those people who do speak of having learned from the past often seem to have picked up the wrong lessons.

America's leaders are convinced, for instance, that the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks justify their country's using any means necessary to achieve current foreign policy goals. And many American pundits somehow learned from their nation's history of foreign warfare that U.S. troops would be met with open arms in Iraq.

All over the world – but especially in the Middle East – perpetrators of violence point to their people's past sufferings as justification for their committing moral outrages.

Yet even though I am riddled with doubts about our ability to make use of the past to create a better future, I still very much want to commemorate the death of 2,000 Jews in Lisbon. A few days ago, I had a seemingly silly daydream that gave me the reason why.

As I was sitting at my desk in my Porto home, I imagined a spaceship from a planet 100 light years away landing nearby, and when our extraterrestrial visitor came down his ramp, I decided to ask him about the history of his people and planet. But he knew almost nothing.

To me, that seemed a waste of a wonderful opportunity. To have journeyed for many decades, across an unimaginable expanse of space, and then have nothing to tell us about what his world has gone through – why come to Earth at all?

My brief daydream left me feeling that those of us without wide and varied historical knowledge have something essential missing from our lives. How is it possible to go on the wonderful journey we each make – from birth to death – without knowing the triumphs and miseries of centuries gone by, without knowing where we have been?

Our history is what any visitors to our planet would want to know first, and they'd be right! Because it helps to make us who we are. The more we know about where we've come from, the greater our insight will be into ourselves, our loved ones, our countries and our world.

I believe now that Jewish tradition, in re-enacting historical events, points us in the exactly the right direction. Past struggles and trials prove to us that we are all on the same journey, and if we are to have any hope at all of rectifying injustices in our world, I believe that we need to be reminded of that as often as possible.

But I'd also like to expand the scope of our Jewish celebrations. Though it might seem absurd to some, I think it's essential that we remember the tragedies and triumphs of other peoples – of Sudanese, Rwandans, Afghanis and everyone else. In part, that's because I believe that all human beings are God's Chosen People. In other words, an African slave shot down by an American plantation owner while fleeing captivity is as much my ancestor – and as worthy of my remembrance – as a Hebrew slave fleeing Egypt 2,500 years ago.

So I'll be in Lisbon on April 29, thinking not only about the Jews massacred in April 1506, but also about everyone still being crushed and murdered on behalf of fundamentalist gods, dictators and political ideals.

Richard Zimler is a novelist living in Porto, Portugal.

Opinions

Who should defend Zionism?

There are many ways to make the case for Israel. Recalling a personal experience or referring to shared values will often help to structure a convincing argument, while other times, references to historic, political or economic factors may be needed to more robustly anchor a particular position.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

But regardless of the forum, there is always the expectation that those who advocate on behalf of Israel have the ability to deal informatively and resolutely with whatever opposing views may come their way. Regrettably, this is not always so.

At colleges and universities, for example, we have all too frequently seen Jewish students outmanoeuvred, if not totally overwhelmed, by their Arab, and other, counterparts.

And while disharmony in our institutions of higher learning tends inevitably to attract media attention, debates on Israel and Jewish issues extend well beyond our campuses.

Outreach to Muslim groups, in particular, seems to be on the rise in various Jewish communities across Canada and the United States. This can be constructive, provided the discourse remains focused on matters of local interest. However, when agendas drift to include aspects of Israeli-Palestinian politics, as sometimes occurs, the "dialogue" may take on a somewhat different tone.

This might require our spokespeople to invoke key points of Jewish history or contextual details relating to the Mideast conflict that they may not be comfortable with. And should the Zionist narrative itself become a focal point, even more care is required to ensure that an informed and appropriate response is articulated.

According to columnist Cheryl Katz Elias, "teaching Zionism is never simple. It is a subject that entails a sometimes overwhelming repertoire of facts. Yet, at the same time, it is as much about instilling a feeling as it is about imparting knowledge"

Historian Gil Troy, in a piece titled "Israel in a Post-Mythological Age," calls for "a step-by-step Zionist resurgence." He suggests that "we can start by taking the term Zionism from its enemies and its more cynical friends and making it again a term of pride, openness, and one-on-one, culturally savvy creativity." He notes that "100 years ago, Zionism brought pride to the label Jew; modern Jews need to bring pride back to the label Zionist – not just for Israel, but for ourselves".

For any community activist, there is surely a relevant lesson in the remarks of Katz Elias and Troy. These are difficult times and the Israel agenda is complex. It's therefore important to identify those among us who have the skills, sensitivity, and, most of all, Zionist passion to effectively engage people who might seek to divide us or to discredit Israel – and let's leave it to them to represent our interests.

The times, they are a-changin'

I got a sense of where things were going when I asked three employees at the Hertz care rental agency who they were planning to vote for. Discussing politics with customers was not exactly part of their job description, and they eyed each other in uncomfortable silence. Finally, the young woman spoke up; "They're all disgusting, I'm not voting at all. None of my friends are either." The others chimed in their agreement.

Ross Culiner in Jerusalem

It wasn't surprising. Israeli politics, or rather politicians, have reached an all-time low in public esteem. Widespread corruption at the highest levels, reprehensible behaviour in the Knesset, the inferior quality of many of the individuals seeking office, and a pervasive sense of mismanagement and waste have alienated large numbers of potential voters, particularly among the young.

And so, as predicted, the day of reckoning was marked by a dismal turnout: in a country that once boasted 80 per cent participation levels in elections, 63 per cent this time around reflected the deep-seated, broad-based malaise.

On entering our designated polling station at 10 a.m. on election day, my wife and I were all alone. And yet, at the very same hour, the grassy expanse of Jerusalem's Sachar Park was rapidly filling up with picnickers staking out their territory for the day. Taking advantage of their unearned freedom (election day is a work holiday in Israel), Israelis flocked to beaches and green spaces for recreation and fun.

"Don't you understand the implications of your not voting?" I found myself repeating again and again. "A vote not cast, is, in real terms, a vote cast for another candidate or party whose platform you may very well detest!"

Such remonstrations were generally greeted with apathy, indifference and a lifting of eyebrows that signalled a sense of helplessness, like when one is already too far gone with a terminal illness. In this instance, it was slow death by democracy.

That's not to say there wasn't an upside to these sleepy elections. For one thing, with fewer banners, placards and leaflets, there was a lot less litter. And what a relief to be done, once and for all, with the rabidly ideological partisanship and blind tribalistic loyalties that have tainted Israeli public life since the very beginning. The Ashkenazi Labor stronghold selected a Moroccan as its leader, and the two big parties, try as they did to sound different, sounded more or less the same. Each attempted to carve out a place for itself in the big and fuzzy political middle, where most Israelis happen to be these days. All that highfalutin' Jewish destiny and historic homeland stuff was less a part of the discourse than were the programs for getting the country out of the terrible jam that "high-minded" talk and thinking had gotten us into. The successful Gaza withdrawal put dampers on much of the former bombast.

You would almost have thought we were in a normal country. Social and economic issues (imagine!) were making headlines. And those slanderous sorts of posters – like the ones that once portrayed Barak (who?) or Peres wearing Arab keffiyahs while bold red letters screamed "Traitor!" or "Will divide Jerusalem!" – were nowhere to be seen.

Of course they weren't. How could they be when Peres, Ramon and Itzik were bedding down with Olmert, Hanegbi and Mofaz in an amorphous concoction called Kadima. It was hard to decide whom exactly to loathe. And when, a mere three weeks ago, a roundtable discussion about the future of Jerusalem was held with representatives from the right and the left, not only did the idea of ultimately dividing – or rather surgically removing – certain Arab neighbourhoods from the "indivisible capital of the Jewish people" fail to arouse protests of outrage from anyone present, it was greeted with the equanimity of an inevitability.

Yes, we are weary. We need a rest from "Politics." Yes, the Palestinians have accomplished something tangible with their persistence, and there's no use denying it. And as a few 20- and 30-year-olds that I met told me, if they were going to vote at all, it was only for the Pensioners party. After all, a secure old age, they pointed out without the least bit of irony, is something you ought to prepare for well in advance.

Israel's little big bang

The recent election in Israel – the sixth in less than 14 years – was not quite the cosmic event that had been advertised.

Kadima, the centrist party established by former prime minister Ariel Sharon shortly before he was incapacitated, emerged as expected as the largest party in the Knesset and will form the next government. This reflects the broad movement away from divisive ideologies and toward pragmatism, but it's happening more slowly than predicted. The big bang that was supposed to replace unstable coalitions and gridlock will have to wait.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Without Sharon at the helm, many voters apparently decided that a vote for Kadima was a major risk. Acting Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is not a former general, has little experience in top government positions, and is an enigma to most Israelis. As well, his party lacks rank-and-file members or a platform that goes beyond the emphasis on pragmatism. The new MKs are also unknown, in many cases, even to each other, adding to the uncertainty.

As a result, the outcome of the vote reflects neither acceptance nor rejection of Olmert's central goal of setting Israel's borders by 2010, with or without negotiations with the Palestinians. This was the centrepiece of Kadima's platform, and represents the main extension of Sharon's legacy of unilateral disengagement. But with a relatively narrow foundation, Kadima will have trouble keeping a stable coalition together long enough to reach this stage.

Instead, the election results show that many Israelis prefer to move cautiously, particularly with the radical Hamas party in power on the Palestinian side.

After the catastrophic end of the Oslo peace process, Israelis have become more skeptical, and they have shifted focus to more immediate and manageable issues, such as the economy and education. The surprising support for the Pensioners party in the election was, in part, a protest against lacklustre candidates and widespread political corruption. And the Pensioners' success showed that Israelis expect their government to find a way to provide a decent standard of living for the elderly. Many Holocaust survivors and immigrants who fled Arab countries, as well as the former Soviet Union, are surviving on a small government social insurance payment.

The Labor party's new leader, Amir Peretz, did better than Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud, and it survived the ordeal. In the campaign, Peretz also stressed social issues, particularly after demonstrating a lack of depth on foreign affairs.

As a result, a coalition with Kadima and Labor at the core –and focused on economic equality, health care and education – could include the religious parties, who also maintained their traditional support. This might provide enough stability to get through four years without new elections, but differences over priorities, including disengagement, or a return to high inflation and unemployment, could also lead to crisis – and yet another round of early elections.

The strength of the coalition and the success of the centrist and pragmatic transition in Israeli politics will also depend on Olmert's performance. His missteps were, in part, blamed for Kadima's relatively poor showing compared to polls during the campaign. And as an untested leader, if he falters, particularly on security issues such as Palestinian terror or Iranian nuclear weapons, he may be challenged from within Kadima, as well as by opposition leaders.

In short, these elections did not produce the big bang that was expected to reshape Israeli politics. But even a somewhat weaker Kadima, anchored in the pragmatic centre, reflects an important movement that can continue to grow and establish deeper roots. Its success, and therefore its future, will be determined by how well Olmert and his colleagues manage the internal agenda, including health and welfare, as well as Israel's complex external relations. If they fail, the fragile foundation on which Kadima is built could collapse, leaving Israel gridlocked for another generation by a myriad of narrow parties, interests and ideologies.

But if they do reasonably well, Kadima will be able to emerge as the new governing party. In addition to guiding policy aimed at making Israel a better place to live, a strong pragmatic centre can also continue to advance the goal of reducing the level of violence and friction in relations with the Palestinians. For most Israelis, this is as optimistic as the current reality will allow.

Dominique Moisi: a specialist of generalities

No man or woman in France seriously interested in current events can avoid Dominique Moisi's weighty pronouncements.

One of France's most prominent commentators and intellectuals, Moisi is a founder of the French Institute of International Affairs, a major think-tank, and the chief editor of its quarterly publication, Politique Etrangere (Foreign Policy). He is a also a professor at the Institute of Political Studies in Paris and a roving academic who has taught at Harvard University.

Sheldon Kirshner in Paris

A columnist for mass-circulation European newspapers, notably the Financial Times, he is a contributor to two important American niche journals, Foreign Affairs and Atlantic Quarterly. In addition, Moisi is the author of France in an Age of Globalization, an adviser to the European Parliament and a regular guest on TV talk shows, both in France and the United States.

The son of a Holocaust survivor, Moisi, 59, describes himself as a generalist, or, as he put it in an interview at his home off the Place de la Concorde in Paris, "a specialist of generalties."

He is interested in three broad topics: Trans-Atlantic relations, a code phrase for Europe's sometimes contentious relationship with the world's only superpower, the United States; Europe and the Middle East, a subject to which he is particularly attuned; and European affairs, which comes naturally to him.

A diminutive, bespectacled man with a shock of graying black hair who favours formal wear, Moisi developed an interest in international affairs long ago, being drawn to the topic by Europe's endemic history of warfare and its treatment of Jews during World War II.

Moisi's father, Jules, an engineer who worked for his family's leather firm, was born in Paris, the scion of Russian immigrants who settled in France in the late 19th century. When Germany invaded France in 1940, he fought in the French army, earning a Military Cross for valour. After France's defeat and the formation of the Vichy government, he and his wife, Charlotte, moved to Nice, in the Free Zone controlled by the Vichy regime and Germany's ally, Italy.

Moisi's parents had no problems in Nice, at least until Germany invaded the Free Zone and began deporting Jews. Jules was sent to Drancy – a transit camp near Paris – in 1943, and from there to Auschwitz. On the day he was arrested, Charlotte went into hiding, finding refuge in a convent in southwest France thanks to the French resistance movement. Having been raised on these stories of their respective ordeals, Moisi formed a hatred of and fascination with war and violence.

At university, he fell under the influence of his teacher, Raymond Aron (1905-1983). A polymath who was a sociologist, historian and political pundit, Aron was a skeptic who was wary of ideological orthodoxy. "He was a towering figure. I made my PhD with Aron," said Moisi, who classifies himself as a moderate.

Having written his thesis on European defence, Moisi intended to join the French foreign service, but then had second thoughts. "I realized I was too independent to be a diplomat." Under Aron's tutelage, he founded what would be the French Institute of International Affairs.

A frequent visitor to Israel, Moisi was an instructor at the Hebrew University in 1972 and 1973. There he met and was enormously influenced by Yehoshafat Harkabi, a colleague who had been director of Israeli military intelligence. He convinced Moisi that the Arab-Israeli conflict could not be resolved without one condition: Palestinian statehood.

Moisi remains an advocate of a two-state solution, but is not sanguine about the prospects of resolving the Arab-Israeli dispute within the foreseeable future.

Arab attitudes toward Israel are a stumbling block: "It will be very difficult for the Arabs to accept Israel. They'll do so only if they have no choice." But Israel has not helped matters either by building settlements in the West Bank, he said.

Nonetheless, Moisi believes that Ariel Sharon, Israel's prime minister, would have been prepared to give up almost all of the West Bank in order to preserve Israel's Jewish and democratic character. (He made this comment before Sharon was incapacitated by a stroke).

Moisi never had much faith in Yasser Arafat, the former president of the Palestinian Authority. "He was more of a problem than a solution." And while Moisi regards his successor, Mahmoud Abbas, as an improvement, he believes that he is weak and wields little power.

To Moisi, anti-Zionism in France is an old story. Intellectuals from the far left, as well as French Muslims, have been delegitimizing Israel for at least 30 years. He regrets that some of the leading anti-Zionist figures in France are Jewish, but in his opinion, most French Jewish intellectuals are pro-Israel. Reflecting on Israel's image in France, Moisi said that prior to the 1967 Six Day War, Israel was "sanctified" by the memory of the Holocaust, but this is not the case today.

Dominique Moisi

Although many of his friends and acquaintances were critical of the 2003 U.S. and allied invasion of Iraq, he supported the war on the grounds that it would spell finis to Saddam Hussein's regime. He was also convinced that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction.

Moisi, however, was always skeptical that the United States and its allies could win the peace. The postwar chaos in Iraq has vindicated his pessimism."The cost of the war, for the United States and the whole region, has been too high," he observed, referring to the current Sunni insurgency. Furthermore, he claimed, the turmoil in Iraq has strengthened Iran and emboldened Tehran to try to acquire a nuclear arsenal.

It was precisely these doubts that prompted Moisi to withdraw his endorsement of the invasion. Three years ago, in a remarkable volte face, he admitted his mistake in a column. But he opposes an immediate or unilateral U.S. pullout, fearing that it would fan lawlessness in Iraq and encourage the majority Shiites to establish an Islamic fundamentalist state.

Speaking about the wave of anti-Semitism that has cascaded across France since the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000, Moisi cautioned that it should not be confused with Vichy's brand of anti-Semitism. "This would be an insult to the memory of those who went through this period. Vichy was officially anti-Semitic. This is not true of the French state today."

In his view, contemporary anti-Semitism is fostered by the extreme right, the far left and radical Muslims. "It would be absurd to deny that reality." Moisi contends that Muslim anti-Semitism is basically rooted in a deep-seated jealousy of the success French Jews have enjoyed in all fields of endeavour.

He does not believe that last year's civil disturbances in France which were perpetrated by disaffected Arab and African youths – were related to their affinity to Islamic radicalism, but by their rage over unresolved social and economic grievances.

He warned that terrorists affiliated with Al Qaeda pose the greatest threat to western civilization, but that they can be overcome.

Moisi caustically dismissed Jean-Marie Le Pen, the leader of the xenophobic National Front, as a "detail of history," saying that he has been eclipsed by the passage of time.

Couple falls in love with more than Israel on birthright

Trip connects pair to Israel and each other

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Fortunately for Toronto's Ayelet Eppel, she missed the boat - in this case, the plane - for a 2002 Canada Israel Experience (CIE) birthright israel trip.

It turns out the 27-year-old Torontonian registered too late for the trip, so she was forced to wait until the following year and neither she, nor her new fiancé, are complaining one bit.

It was thanks to that subsequent December 31, 2003 birthright israel sojourn that Ayelet – a madricha (leader) on the popular, structured Israel experience, at no cost to participants - first set eyes on her husband-to-be, Joel Borgida, during a birthright israel orientation session in November, at the Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services in Toronto.

They got engaged on April 1, this year and, despite the fact that Ayelet's mother, Patricia Tolken Eppel, feared it was an April Fool's hoax, they weren't kidding.

"I noticed Adam for the first time at that orientation session and then I saw him again a week later, on Christmas Eve at a Jewish single's party," says Ayelet, a research coordinator for the Ontario Pancreas Cancer Study at Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital. "I knew right away that there was something pretty special about this guy."

"There was definitely some chemistry when we saw each other," says Joel, "the best part of it though was how we met in that environment. It was great to see her so passionate about Israel."

Ayelet and Joel continued getting to know one another following the trip. "We really didn't spend time together in Israel because you're just so busy with so many activities. Besides, as a madricha, you're not supposed to get involved with participants," she says.

A strong proponent of birthright israel, Ayelet had been in Israel before. In fact, when she was one year old, her parents, contemplating making aliyah, moved there for a year. Then, at age 16, Ayelet took a six-week tour of Israel, before volunteering for Magen David Adom (Israel's equivalent of the Red Cross) for three months in the summer of 2000.

"To be part of birthright israel is like no other experience," she says. "It's especially important for people like Joel, who hadn't been to Israel before. I see so many of my peers transformed by birthright. Just being in this incredible place connects so many to their roots and to the land. I've also seen participants reconnect with long-lost family members who live in Israel. It's just an amazing thing to be part of."

Joel Borgida and Ayelet Eppel, who met on a 2003 birthright israel trip, are now engaged.

"I really never felt like I had a particular connection with Israel before, but I guess that's because I had never been there," explains Joel. "But once I got there, it was just such an overwhelming experience. Just hours after getting off the plane, we spent Shabbat at the Kotel (Western Wall). It was unbelievable. What really surprised me the most about Israel was the people. With the way Israel's portrayed in the media, I got there expecting to see a country walking on egg shells. That wasn't it at all. The people simply live their lives."

Internship program helps new olim crack the job market

Aliyah is a common dream for many young Jews living in the Diaspora. For a lot of them, however, a major barrier stands in their way - employment.

The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) – UJA Federation's overseas partner - is attempting to smooth the way with an internship program aimed at young students from abroad.

The program gives prospective olim (immigrants), aged 19-35, work experience in their fields and access to the Israeli job market. Interns volunteer in their field for two to six months. While they are volunteering they become familiar with Israel and the Israeli way of life, and can meet young Israelis. The program enjoys extensive support within Israel, which has led to some great internship opportunities. "They get placements in the Knesset (Israeli Parliament) and in the Supreme Court, which Israelis cannot get," says Vered Layish, coordinator of the professional internship program. "People realize a lot of young people want to visit Israel, but not as tourists - as a person who works and gets to know the Israeli mentality, the Israeli community."

The professional internship program has been in existence for 20 years, but recently it has grown exponentially.

Last year, 450 interns from around the world participated in the program. Twenty percent of them made aliyah on their arrival in Israel, and many of them were offered jobs at companies such as Elite, Bank Leumi, and the Peres Conference for Peace.

"Everyone who is coming here and having a good time is a success story," says Layish. "But a lot of people are offered jobs, making aliyah and staying in Israel. Other people are finding love in Israel, marrying Israelis and staying here."

In addition to professional opportunities, the program is effective in strengthening Jewish identity. "I think it's important for any young Jew to come to Israel, to see what it's all about here," says Layish.

Ontario Jewish Archives seeks synagogue artifacts

By CARLA LANCIT
UJA Federation

Do you have a piece of Toronto's Jewish history gathering dust in the attic? The UJA Federation Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA) is currently soliciting photos, documents, artifacts and memories from the Anshei Minsk and the Beaches Hebrew Institute for its virtual exhibit, "Toronto's First Synagogues."

The OJA is in the process of adding these two synagogues to the three already on exhibit: the First Narayever Congregation, Congregation Knesseth Israel, and the Kiever Synagogue.

The exhibit, which can be viewed on the OJA's web site (www.ontariojewishsharchives.org), documents the history of Toronto's early synagogues. Visitors get a taste of Jewish Toronto's past through texts, photographs, historical documents and audio/video clips.

"Toronto's First Synagogues", a collaborative initiative between the OJA and Robert Burley, a professor of photography at Ryerson, was funded through a grant from Canada's Digital Collections, Industry Canada.

"I'm excited that the OJA is able to expand our virtual exhibit to include these two early synagogues," says chair of the Ontario Jewish Archives, Brooky Robins. "The partnership with Ryerson University professor Bob Burley, along with the two synagogues involved and the community - in terms of personal donations and stories, should lead to a marvelous product, in keeping with the quality and standards set by the original site."

The ark at Toronto's First Narayever Synagogue

Among the items on display are the 1918 letters of incorporation for the First Narayever Congregation, a 1975 Canadian Jewish News ad for Congregation Knesseth Israel, a 1906 photo of Cantor Bernhard Wladowsky, and the original 1923 architectural drawings of the Kiever Synagogue.

Visitors can also watch a video of Sukkot services at the Kiever Synagogue in 1984, or listen to oral histories.

Accompanying text explains each synagogue's early history and architecture, as well as the role of religion and social life in the synagogue's past. The exhibit also documents the part that these synagogues play in Toronto's Jewish community today.

Individuals who have photos, documents, or artifacts from the Anshei Minsk or the Beaches Hebrew Institute, or who were active or members of the synagogues during the early years and would like to record an oral history, can contact the Ontario Jewish Archives at 416-635-2883 ext. 170 or oja1@ujafed.org

Hard times could not diminish love for Pesach

Sara Ginaite-Rubinson continues to hold Passover dear

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Passover has always been a special time for Sara Ginaite-Rubinson.

The Toronto native born in Kaunas, Lithuania's former capital, who, along with her entire family, was imprisoned in the Kaunas Ghetto during the war, went on to join the underground Anti-Fascist Fighting Organization resistance movement.

Her father later died in the Ghetto while her sister and mother were sent to Stuthoff concentration camp, where her mother perished.

"The most memorable holiday for me was Passover," Ginaite-Rubinson told Jewish Toronto. "I remember the beautifully set table graced by a plate of sweet fruits, honey, bitter herbs, and the somber symbolism of a bone, scraped clean."

Ginaite-Rubinson, the author of Resistance and Survival, is the keynote speaker at this year's Yom Hashoah Community Commemoration Service, on Monday, April 24 at 7:00 p.m. at Earl Bales Park (Bathurst, south of Sheppard).

Even while imprisoned in the Ghetto, Ginaite-Rubinson recalls how her mother would cook Pesach meals, including what she calls "empty fish."

"We tried to preserve the holiday even in the Ghetto. My mother would cook all the vegetables which we would normally put in the fish. We had no fish, of course, so we'd have to settle for a potato on top. It was empty fish."

Apart from the religious aspects of Passover, for Ginaite-Rubinson, the holiday is also a celebration of spring and the rebirth of nature.

"It was usually warm at that time of the year in Kaunas and during the holidays, when almost all of the Jewish-owned businesses were closed, the Jews of Kaunas dressed in their nice clothes and went for leisurely walks," she says. "The entire city seemed to be celebrating the liberation of the Jews from Egyptian slavery."

Ginaite-Rubinson has been cooking up a storm for Passover this year and the traditions of the holiday mean more to her now than ever.

"I am very happy to have lived to see the day when our entire family, small as it is, gathers every year at the home of my youngest daughter Anya Rubinsonaite-Sorkin, to celebrate the Passover Seder. My granddaughter, Riva, asks her father: 'What makes this night different from all other nights?' And he answers, 'We were slaves. Moses delivered us from Egypt and led us into G-d's Promised Land. Now we are free. Israel is an independent country and we can meet in Jerusalem whenever we choose.'"

Sara Ginaite-Rubinson, today and as she was in 1944 when she was part of the underground Anti-Fascist Fighting Organization resistance movement while imprisoned in the Kaunas Ghetto.

Debit card combines food packages with personal choice

JDC introduces electronic innovation to increase dignity for food recipients

With a cart full of Passover products, Irena (her last name is being left out to protect her anonymity) excitedly walks the aisles of the Kirovskiy supermarket in Yekaterinburg, capital of the Ural mountain region of Russia. "I am most excited for the applesauce and bananas," she says, pointing to the products in her basket.

This trip to the food store is an exciting one for Irena because it's the first time she's using her new SUPERmarket debit card, developed by the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) – an overseas partner of UJA Federation – for recipients of food packages, who would otherwise be severely undernourished.

The SUPERmarket program in Yekaterinburg is modeled after the successful COTO card program in Argentina. After the collapse of Argentina's economy in 2001, JDC sprung into action by giving food packages to needy Jewish families. It quickly became evident that this form of aid was not well received by recipients. The food packages were replaced with monthly food vouchers and finally by debit cards accepted at COTO supermarkets.

Before the Yekaterinburg program began, Irena would receive a food package filled with items already selected by the local JDC Hesed centre. Today, food card program participants can shop with a sense of dignity and the freedom to choose their own food. To help with product selection, JDC worked with a local Jewish nutritionist to create a kosher-style food guide.

The goal of the program, which began in September last year, is 250 participants and every Kirovskiy store branch in Yekaterinburg.

JDC's Urals office worked with one of the biggest banks in Russia, Vneshtorbank to set up the electronic debit cards. To guard against misuse, the cards are programmed to be accepted only at the Kirovskiy market. They can not be used at cash machines or other stores.

Money is electronically transferred monthly onto the card, which can then be used between the 10th and 20th of the month. If the full amount is not used in any one month, the remainder rolls over to the following month.

Those enrolled in the program must also buy foods that adhere to the kosher-style guide and the food store reports back with lists of the products each individual purchased.

Gesturing to the long line behind her at the checkout, Irena proudly hands her orange credit card to the cashier, "I am grateful for this card," she says. "After all, it is not every Russian pensioner who can boast a personal credit card."

An orange debit card, developed by the JDC, allows participants to shop with a sense of dignity.

Community budget briefing

The provincial Liberal government is aiming for a balanced budget next year, according to David Zimmer, who represents the Willowdale riding in the provincial legislature and serves as parliamentary assistant to attorney general Michael Bryant.

Zimmer conducted a recent budget briefing for Jewish community members, sponsored by UJA Federation and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario Region. He stressed the importance of extra funding for public transit in the recent provincial budget, particularly a proposed subway extension to Vaughan, and he touched on the controversial questions of government financial assistance for independant schools.

Family-in-Israel dinner to honour Elie Kalb

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Edie Kalb confessed that she was very surprised when Emunah Women of Toronto nominated her as the honoree for this year's Family-in-Israel Dinner, which will be held at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue on May 9.

"I'm not the kind [to be a dinner honoree]," she said, visibly squirming, "but they talked me into it."

She recognizes the special honour it is that she was chosen solely for merit, "not for any other reason."

Kalb said that when her son, Brian, now 31, was having problems learning in a regular day school, she enrolled him in She'arim Hebrew Day School, a school for children with learning disabilities.

"He was one of the first six students at the school. We had no funding from anyplace. We didn't even really know what learning disabilities meant – and no one else really knew that much more anyway."

Kalb, with the urging of Elaine Rubinoff, then principal of the school, started a parents' association. "We used to have a goods and services auction, and then we had an art auction. One parent was an accountant, and had experience being an auctioneer. So she was the auctioneer, and also handled the money."

The first event raised $3,000, the next $6,000. At the art auction, they raised $20,000.

That, she said, was her first experience at leadership.

The Kalb family, inspired by the example of daughter Lisa, now living in Detroit with her three children, became more observant, and eventually became shomer Shabbat. Wanting some connection to the Orthodox world, she joined Emunah Women of Canada, a religious Zionist organization that raises money for children, day-care centres, residential facilities and other social programs in Israel.

It didn't take long for her to become active in Emunah. First, she worked and then chaired the annual bazaar. "I felt that Emunah hadn't moved forward to acknowledge the new way of doing things," Kalb said.

Besides working on the bazaar, she has served as editor of the organization's newsletter, public-relations chair, vice-president for two years, president for two years, and two more as co-president.

"In Israel, Emunah gets a lot of respect, because of our family and social services and schools – all with the love of Torah. But I felt that Toronto wasn't giving this information over as well as it could."

First, she said, she insisted that the bazaar be certified under COR, rather than the women cooking in their kitchens. To the members' surprise, Kalb said, "the food was all sold out. I had taken the organization to a more religious plane."

Kalb felt that people wanted to come for entertainment in a place with kosher auspices. She organized the first kosher murder mystery night, developed parties, and organized such gala events as En Hiver and En Printemps. "We have elegant affairs, in really nice places."

Attendance at Emunah events soared from an average of 80 people to an average of 300, while the Mother-in-Israel Dinner, which changed its name to Family-in-Israel Dinner so that husbands could come too, was attended by 450 people.

Kalb encouraged Emunah to participate in communal events, such as the Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations.

Two scholarships to study in Israel are given each year by Emunah. Unlike many such projects, they do not necessarily go to girls with the highest marks or the greatest financial need.

"We try to find girls who are exemplary in academics and in serving the community," Kalb said. "We want to identify and encourage potential leaders," she said.

Kalb is extremely proud of the work Emunah does in Israel. "It sponsors women's shelters, and crisis centres, such as the one at Neve Michael in Pardes Chana, which is available to help [children in danger or at risk] 24/7, said Kalb.

Initially, Kalb's new approaches were not always appreciated by some of the members of Emunah. "After all, I was the new kid on the block, and here I was changing the way things had been done." However, her ideas have now been accepted, and she has mentored many young people joining the organization, as members and even as officers – including the current president, Joyce Rifkind.

She said her family, especially her husband, Jack, a renovation contractor, have been supportive and encouraging. Her children, grandchildren and other family members are planning to come to the dinner.

The Family-in-Israel Dinner is dedicated to the memory of Sharon Rosenblum Leff, a popular and committed longtime member of Emunah, who died this past year at the age of 61.

Jewish Life

Obligation and freedom

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

In the contemporary Jewish calendar, the classic seven-week journey from Pesach to Shavuot is punctuated by two significant days – Yom Hashoah and Yom Ha'atzmaut. The timing of all of this could not be less accidental in a philosophical sense, and casts light on what is ultimately a precarious strategy in current Jewish education.

Traditionally, the liberation entailed by the Exodus could only be fulfilled by the receiving of the Torah at Sinai. The great paradox of freedom fulfilled through acceptance of the yoke of the kingdom of heaven was not lost on the Talmudic sages. Rava comments: "All people are vessels; happy is he who is a vessel for Torah." This simple message is volcanic in its effects.

Rava intimates that thrusting off the "burden" of religion with the seemingly autonomous perspective of secularism is an illusion. Given the enormously powerful forces of nature and environment, one is bound to "serve" some master work – money, status, attractiveness. The modern world is filled with such slaveries, so the obligation imposed by mitzvot is simply a desire to serve the highest.

Once upon a time, Jewish children were taught to see Shavuot, in a profound sense, as the end goal. "Getting out of Egypt" was only purposeful if there was a place to arrive, a goal for living called Torah. But today, the widespread alienation from observance has led to an enormous dual emphasis placed on remembering the Shoah and celebrating the State of Israel. These two impulses are best exemplified by the increasingly popular March of the Living, which combines both notions.

It is not that the march is a bad thing; quite the contrary, it can create a powerful stimulus to Jewish identity. But inevitably, stimulation without discipline is a ticket to frustration and even decadence. After Auschwitz and Israel, to what will these children come back? I have had hundreds of students go on the march, and their return almost always leaves them with predictable dilemmas.

To these students, the most pragmatic questions slowly replace the understandable high that suffuses their trip. How will the seductive energies of feeling proud to be a Jew translate back into the "mundanity" of your native environments? In what practical way will you incorporate Judaism into your lives? Will you increase your Torah study? Will you take on Jewish observance in a serious way? Where? With whom? Think Jewish, act Jewish, live Jewish? Or will the experience be oddly diminished in the long run, as the climb down from the peaks of the march into the valley of ordinary living, without a plan or a structure as to how to really go about the business of being a serious Jew, leads to drift?

And so Shavuot beckons beyond the "intermediate days" of Yom Hashoah and Yom Ha'Atzmaut. In his 2002 book Lidrosh Elohim (To Seek Out God), the Israeli psychologist Yair Caspi relates his profound transformation many years before as a result of attending a chavurah at the Jerusalem apartment of the famed professor Yeshahyau Leibowitz. In the opening page, Capsi recalls Leibowitz's thundering words: "One who seeks out freedom will not find freedom. [But] one who seeks out obligation will possibly find freedom." And from that day, relates Caspi, he became a different human being.

In memory of my rabbi and rebbitzen

Guest Voice

By JULIEN BAUER

A little bit more than 10 years ago, while spending a sabbatical year in Jerusalem, I was introduced to Rabbi Hayyim Yaacov Bulka, who invited me to his weekly Talmud shiur (lesson). I was immediately hooked, attending regularly for a year, then every summer, which I spend in Jerusalem, followed by weekly attendance during a second sabbatical.

Rabbi Bulka was the kind of rabbi Jews can be proud of. He was both learned – which is not unusual for a rabbi – and had an extensive knowledge of secular topics.

I knew he was a graduate of Hildensheimer Seminary in Germany, but I once asked him what university he had attended.

"I have no academic degree," he told me.

"But the way you teach us combines both the traditional yeshiva type of learning and the modern university style," I replied.

"I went to university as a free student, not to get a degree, but to open my mind. Please don't tell anyone!" he implored.

This was revealing. Today, we have a choice between rabbi-doctors, for whom a PhD is of the utmost importance, and rabbis who assiduously refuse to learn anything outside the yeshiva curriculum.

Rabbi Bulka was one of those too few who followed the philosophy of Torah umada (Torah and science).

His students were mostly retired Americans, some with very strong Jewish backgrounds, some with weaker ones. With his vast knowledge, he could easily have tried to impose his views. Rather, he preferred to offer arguments in an effort to persuade.

If one of us asked a question and Rabbi Bulka was not sure of the answer, he would study the sources for a whole week and give us an extensive explanation in the following shiur. Once, upon hearing sheer nonsense from one of his students, he very nicely and delicately guided the fellow away from his lack of knowledge and toward a measure of common sense. And in that particular case, believe me, it was not easy.

Rabbi Bulka could do that because he was genuinely interested in people, always ready to help, always smiling. Even when he suffered his own health problems, he always displayed a sense of humour that one does not usually associate with rabbis, especially in Israel.

Rabbi Bulka did not dress according to the custom of 150 years ago in Germany in order to show he was a rabbi, as many today are inclined to do. He dressed modestly, in classic modern garb. Nevertheless it was obvious to everyone that he was a rabbi.

I remember one morning, coming back from the shiur, a young girl telling her sister, "Let the rabbi pass."

I asked her, "Do you know him?"

"No," she replied.

"So how do you know he is a rabbi?"

She looked at me quizzically and answered: "How can this man not be a rabbi?"

A similar question and observation could have been made about Rebbitzen Yehudit Bulka. She was not one of the many American retirees living in the Wolfson Towers in Jerusalem. She was the Rebbitzen. At home, helping her husband, and outside, caring for people, she behaved the way I had always imagined in my heart that a rebbitzen should behave. Alas, she survived her husband by only one month.

She passed away before Pesach.

Whenever I was in Jerusalem, one of my preferred activities was to attend Rabbi Bulka's shiur and simply speak with him.

Now, there is a void.

This summer when I'm in Jerusalem, instead of learning with him, I will go to his graveside.

May the memory of Rabbi Hayyim Yaacov Bulka, my rabbi, and his wife Rebbitzen Yehudit Bulka, be a source of comfort to their children and of blessing for Klal Yisrael.

Jewish Life

Making a difference

To Heal a Fractured World: The Ethics of Responsibility* by Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, Random House.

Books
Bernard Baskin

In this wise, inspiring and compassionate book, Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, the chief rabbi of the United Hebrew Congregations of Great Britain and the Commonwealth since 1991, asks challenging and pertinent questions: What are our duties to others, to society, and to humanity? How do we live a meaningful life in an age of global uncertainty and instability? What are the answers of religion to the difficult questions of modern society?

The author seeks his answers in a forthright and searching discussion of the ethics of responsibility. In his quest, he turns first to the Hebrew Scriptures and Jewish theology, and then to the teachings of philosophers and ethicists from other cultures. "We are here to make a difference," he writes, "a day at a time, an act at a time, for as long as it takes to make the world a place of justice and compassion."

He points out that either God exists or he does not. If he does, we will be rewarded for the good that we do. If he does not, we will still be rewarded, for there is no greater reward then the knowledge that you have healed some of the pain of our deeply troubled world, mitigated some of its injustice and cured even a fraction of its ills.

For the author, Jewish ethics is refreshingly down to earth. If someone is in need, give. If someone is lonely, invite them home. If someone you know has recently been bereaved, visit them and give them comfort. If you know of someone who has lost a job, do all you can to help him or her find another. The sages called this "imitating God." They went further: giving hospitality to a stranger, they said, is "even greater than receiving the divine presence." That is religion at its most humanizing and humane.

In the book's final chapter, the author sums up what he has learned about ethics in a series of brief aphorisms. They include the following:

- Each of us is here for a purpose;
- Even the smallest good deed can change someone's life;
- It is not the honours we receive that matter, but the honour we give;
- What counts is not how much wealth we make but how much of what we have, we share;
- There is no greater gift we can give our children than to let them see us sacrifice something for the sake of an ideal;
- Religions reach their highest levels when they stop worrying about other people's souls and care, instead, for the needs of their bodies;
- No religion that persecutes others is worthy of respect, nor one that condemns others, entitled to admiration;
- Putting others down, we diminish ourselves; lifting others, we lift ourselves;
- Pain and loneliness are forms of energy that can be transformed if we turn them outward, using them to recognize and redeem someone else's pain or loneliness.

Rabbi Sacks concludes his volume with these uplifting words: "To heal where others harm, mend where other destroy, to redeem evil by turning its negative energies to good: these are the mark of the ethics of responsibility, born in the radical faith that God calls on us to exercise our freedom by becoming his partners in the work of creation. That seems to me a life-affirming vision... becoming co-authors with God of the world that ought to be."

Humour in the Holocaust

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On the evening of Monday, April 24, the 27th of Nisan – candles will be lit around the world to honour the memory of the millions of Jews who perished during the Holocaust. On Yom Hashoah, we also remember the courage and defiance Jews showed during the war. That defiance could have taken the form of physical confrontation but often it was seen as psychological resistance such as the use of humour against their Nazi oppressors. Today, a look at humour during the Holocaust.

As part of her doctoral thesis, Chaya Ostrower interviewed more than 50 survivors of the Shoah to find out how and why they used humour during the war. They said it was an outlet for feelings of aggression, a defence mechanism, and a stress reducer. It did not reduce the horrors of atrocities they were witnessing, but it did help them cope. One survivor told Ostrower, "However little it was, however sporadic, however spontaneous, it was very important, very important. Humour and satire played a tremendous role, in my opinion. It was a cemetery all right and exactly for that reason, the mere fact that we wanted somehow to preserve our personality, they wanted to make robots out of us." [http://tinyurl.com/jyefr]

That sentiment was echoed by the late Emil Fackenheim, philosopher and survivor of Auschwitz: "We kept our morale through humour." Fackenheim is quoted in the essay Humour in the Holocaust: Its Critical, Cohesive and Coping Functions. In it, John Morreall writes that western culture has a "long tradition of prejudice against humour, especially in connection with anything as tragic as the Holocaust." But he suggests that the ancient Greeks and Shakespeare saw a different value for comedy. "Comedy is not 'time out' from the real world; rather it provides another perspective on that world," such as the solidarity of the oppressed during the war.

As Hitler's armies faced more and more setbacks, he asked his astrologer, "Am I going to lose the war?"

"Yes," the astrologer said.

"Then, am I going to die?" Hitler asked.

"Yes."

"When am I going to die?"

"On a Jewish holiday."

"But on what holiday?"

"Any day you die will be a Jewish holiday."

[http://tinyurl.com/lxjy3]

In their Big Book of Jewish Humor, William Novak and Moshe Waldoks devote a large section to anti-Semitism and wartime humour, including the following.

Sensing Hitler's imminent takeover of his country, an Austrian Jew goes to a travel agent to find a way to escape. He is shown a globe but then is told that nearly every country has made Jewish immigration impossible. In desperation he asks, "Haven't you got another globe?" [http://tinyurl.com/r84cn] (Note: to read these free excerpts, you will need to register at Amazon.com.)

While most of the Jewish humour during the Shoah was whispered in defiance, the situation was very different at the Westerbork Transit Camp. Writing in the Yad Vashem Online Magazine, Yehudit Shendar explains how camp Kommandant A.K. Gemmeker encouraged prisoner and theatre director Max Ehrlich to present entertainment including classical concerts, recitals and cabaret shows. The most notable, Humour and Melody, was a satirical presentation of daily life in the camp. "Jewish talent performed repeatedly for auditoriums packed with Jewish prisoners, while Nazi camp commanders filled the front rows." Unfortunately, the fate of most of these talented performers was only delayed by their participation in the shows. [http://tinyurl.com/fcysc]

Although humour was generally used as a psychological survival technique, the Hebrew-language site, Humour as a Defense Mechanism during the Shoah, tells the story of how it made the difference between life and death. A boy of 10 was standing in line at the Birkenau crematorium. While the rest of the children were crying and screaming, the boy began to laugh loudly. An SS officer asked him what he was laughing about. He said, "You're about to kill me and I have to stand in line for that?" According to the site, the SS officer freed him and he survived. [http://tinyurl.com/pmmbk]

HOW CAN WE HELP THE PEOPLE OF DARFUR?

AN EVENING TO RAISE PUBLIC AWARENESS
AN EVENING TO MOBILIZE AN EFFECTIVE UNIFIED RESPONSE
Please join us
TEMPLE EMANU-EL
THURSDAY, APRIL 27TH, 7:30 P.M.

As Canadians and as members of the Jewish community we are all very concerned with what many are calling genocide in the Darfur Region of Sudan.

On April 27th come to Temple Emanu-El to hear from speakers who have personally visited the refugee camps, and witnessed the atrocities that continue to threaten the lives of people in Sudan today. There will be an opportunity to ask questions, sign petitions, and learn how we can offer support for the people of Darfur.

Sixty years ago, the world looked away as six million Jews were slaughtered in the Holocaust.
Ten years ago, the world was silent as eight hundred thousand Tutsis were butchered in Rwanda.
Today, the world stands idly by as many thousands of Darfurians are killed.

ICRF honours three Women of Action

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Some 500 people filled an Arcadian Court banquet hall earlier this month to honour the 2006 Israel Cancer Research Fund's Women of Action.

Gallery owner Sandra Ainsley, volunteer and philanthropist Lesley Binstock Offman, researcher Dr. Janet Rossant and the event's keynote speaker, Globe and Mail columnist Margaret Wente, were recognized for their achievements.

The Israel Cancer Research Fund (ICRF) has been supporting cancer research in Israel since 1975. In 2004, professors Avram Hershko and Aaron Ciechanover of the Technion-Israel Institute of Technology received the Nobel Prize in chemistry for research partly funded by ICRF.

Previous Women of Action honorees include realtor Elise Kalles, Nova Scotia Lieut.-Gov. Myra Freeman, cookbook author Rose Reisman, and Supreme Court Justice Rosalie Abella.

After losing her husband to leukemia in 1985, Ainsley was left as the sole supporter of her three sons. She was urged to give up the gallery she had just opened in Yorkville, but she chose to carry on with her dream. The gallery is now a 10,000-square-foot facility in the Distillery District, specializing in glass.

The measure of success, she told luncheon attendees, is not just financial. Rather, it comes from the energy and satisfaction that success brings you.

Offman, who lost her first husband to cancer in 1991, began her volunteering career as a child, "standing on a table and selling shmattes at the Hadassah Bazaar." Realizing that "many Jews and non-Jews were less fortunate than I was," she continued her philanthropic and communal work with hospitals, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Baycrest, and Kolel, the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

Organization has supported cancer research in Israel since 1975

Cancer, she said, is no longer a certain death sentence. Nevertheless, it still strikes far too often, she said, discussing her work with ICRF.

Rossant, a professor at the University of Toronto, is chief of research at the Hospital for Sick Children, the first Canadian woman, and one of the few women in North America, to hold such a position. She is particularly involved in stem cell research.

Science, she said, is an international language that gives her a common set of values with people she comes into contact with. She said she sees science as one of the primary routes to peace in the world.

In her address, Wente, an award-winning Globe columnist, said she is concerned about the increasing power of violence emanating from the Muslim community worldwide.

"Some teachers in France have stopped teaching about the Holocaust, because of fear of reprisals [from Muslim extremists]," Wente said.

She urged the audience to appreciate the greatness and goodness of Canadian society. "Don't be wishy-washy about Canadian values," she told them.

Fundraising at the event included a silent auction, an auction of a trip for two to Israel, scarves produced to raise money in memory of a young man who died of cancer, and the launch of Cooking Kindness: Heroes in the Kitchen, edited by Gloria Guttman. Proceeds from the sale of the cookbook will go to ICRF.

Hamas tries hard to pretend it's something else

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On April 8, the National Post carried a story by Tim Butcher of the Daily Telegraph under the optimistic headline, "Hamas may recognize Israel." The piece covered an interview that Palestinian Authority Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar gave to the London Times, in which he hinted that Hamas might consider a two-state solution, thus implying recognition of Israel. Many news outlets, including the Israeli media, ran similar accounts of the interview.

Butcher wrote: "A willingness to consider a two-state solution implies acceptance of Israel's right to exist alongside a Palestinian nation, something Hamas has never agreed to before… Should Hamas genuinely be considering modifying its stance and preparing to recognize Israel, the likely catalyst is [the April 6] decision by the European Union to freeze the next monthly payment of the $600 million (US) a year the EU and its member states give the cash-strapped Palestinian Authority."

The key question is whether Hamas, a radical Islamic fundamentalist movement sworn to Israel's destruction, is prepared to renounce this cornerstone principle in order to gain international acceptance and the financial aid that comes with it.

Some Hamas leaders, including PA Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh (sometimes described as a "relative moderate") have tried to avoid talking about the movement's more extreme aims in order to give the Hamas government a veneer of pragmatism.

Meanwhile, some Middle East analysts are eager to take any Hamas statement, no matter how ambiguous, as proof that, like the PLO before it, Hamas, too, is capable of moderating its views.

But, as a number of Israeli analysts have noted, one must distinguish between the secular nationalists of the PLO – many of whom have still not reconciled themselves to Israel's existence – and the Islamic fundamentalists of Hamas, all of whom remain true believers in the eventual triumph of Islam over Israel. These Israeli analysts argue that many westerners simply can't comprehend how ideologically committed Hamas is to Israel's disappearance from "Islamic land."

Hamas' Mahmoud Zahar is a known hardliner who recently told a Chinese news agency that "there is no room for Israel on this land."

In the London Times interview, Zahar was repeatedly asked if Hamas is prepared to accept the Quartet's demands in order to return to negotiations for a two-state solution: renunciation of violence, recognition of Israel, and acceptance of previous agreements between the PLO and Israel.

Is radical Islamic fundamentalist movement sworn to Israel's destruction, prepared to renounce this cornerstone principle?

Zahar was extremely evasive on the question of a two-state solution, saying, "What is the concept in the Quartet about the two-state solution and on what basis?" After remarking that this is something "to discuss with our president [PA President Mahmoud Abbas]," Zahar added. "We are not here speaking about [Israel in the] '48 or '67 [borders], we are speaking about what they [the Israelis] are going to offer."

And at least on this point he was abundantly clear: the Palestinians – "more than five million" have the "right to come back to our land." This is code for the "right of return," which means the elimination of Israel as a Jewish state.

While many in the media were quick to interpret the mere appearance of some moderate-sounding words from a staunch rejectionist like Zahar as evidence that Hamas is softening its position, this more upbeat note was soon quashed by a Hamas "moderate."

In an April 9 Ha'aretz story "Haniyeh: PA won't bow to foreign pressure to recognize Israel," Shmuel Rosner reported on the reiteration of Hamas' strident anti-Israel position: "Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh said [on April 8 that] his government would not bow to foreign pressure to recognize Israel and disavow violence, despite funding cuts that are pushing the Palestinian Authority to financial collapse."

Hamas may speak of ceasefires and temporary truces if Israel accedes to (impossible) conditions. It may even go through all sorts of verbal gymnastics to try to convince naïve Western audiences that it's heading toward genuine moderation. But in the end, Hamas cannot renounce its core religious belief that a Jewish state has no right to exist in the Middle East – without, that is, ceasing to be Hamas.

EDUCATION AT BETH TIKVAH SYNAGOGUE

Yom Ha Sho'ah V'Hagevurah

at Beth Tikvah Synagogue

Sunday April 23rd at 2:30 p.m.

please join us for the screening of

THE LONG WAY HOME

an epic Academy-Award winning film to commemorate Yom Ha Sho'ah

After the Shoah, more than 300,000 survivors made their way to Eretz Israel. The liberation of the death camps and the recovery from the Shoah, together with the fight against the British and the Arabs to establish a new Jewish state, ranks as a miraculous achievement. The film, which uses rare archival footage, original broadcasts and personal testimonies, is narrated by Morgan Freeman. It is a must-see to understand the background of the State of Israel. Although there are some graphic scenes of the Shoah, it should be seen by young adults, in particular.

The Community is invited to attend this very special program. There is no charge.

המוזודה של חנה

בתיאטרון הילדים והנוער של טורונטו (Young People's Theatre) מוצגת גרסה תיאטראלית של סיפורה המופלא של המוזודה של חנה ברידי, קורבן שואה בת שתים עשרה. סביר להניח שרבים מכם מכירים את הסיפור מהופעתו ב- סי.בי.סי או בספר המרגש שבא בעקבותיו. אבל לטובת מי שלא שמע- הינה התקציר: ספרנית יפנית מקימה מכון להנצחת השואה בטוקיו ומבקשת ממויאון שואה באירופה חפצים סמליים. לטוקיו מגיעה מוזודה שנושאת את השם חנה ברידי, והיפנית בעקשנות ודבקות נוטעת לאירופה, מזהה מי הילדה, מגלה שאחיה של חנה חי בטורונטו, שאין הוא יודע את גורל אחותו, וסוגרת סיפור מרגש ומדהים.
ואני, שחשבתי שעקב היכרותי את הסיפור תעבור עלי ההצגה בשלום-התבדיתי. ההפקה כל כך מרגשת, עשויה בטוב טעם מדהים דרך עיניהם של ילדים- אתה מודה לאלוהים שמצאתָ זמן ללכת. עוד מספר שבועות היא כאן-או תעזבו הכל ותרוצו. ואם עולה בידכם-קחו גם את הילדים.

אהרון בן שושן ותזמורת דאפינה

לפני כשבועיים עברה עלינו אחת החוויות האמנותיות הכי שלמות של הזמן האחרון. בבית כנסת קטן ויפיפה בדאון טאון (קינגסרס) הופיע החזן אהרון בן שושן עם תזמורת דאפינה. דאפינה, כפי שלמדתי, הוא ג'ולנט מרוקאי, ואכן-כשמם כן הם-מוסיקאים מכל קצוות עולם, כמעט כולם לא יהודים, שמאוחדים באהבתם למוסיקה הערבית. הנינגים הספרדיים של בן שושן נשמעו כמו קונצרט של ג'או-בלוז, כשברקע מתנגנים נאי (חליל מרוקאי) ובאנג'ו אידי וסאקסופון אלט מיבב. חוויה מוסיקאלית מדהימה.
או למה אני טורח לספר לכם על קונצרט שכבר היה? משום שבן שושן מעלה קונצרט נוסף ביום ירושלים בבית הכנסת שלי-"בית אמת", לצידה של שולי נתן שתגיע מישראל. אל תחכו. 416 6333838

בחירות-הסאברוק האמיתי

פזורו כל כך הרבה מלים על הבחירות, שקשה לאמר דברים של טעם. מעניין-הביבי בפרס מתקרבים לגיל פרישה-ומפלגת הגימלאים משיגה שבעה מנדטים. בהחלט הגיוני. שנים רבות תהיתי מדוע ציבור כל כך מקופח לא משתמש בכוחו האלקטורלי האדיר. אז הינה זה בא. הישראלים-חלקם ספרדים, חלקם אשכנים, חלקם ערבים או יהודים, חילוניים או דתיים. אבל כוחותלם, ממש כולם יהיו זקנים ויסבלו מתאבזריות של המדיניות שנקבעת על ידי אנשים בשיא כוחם, שאינם מתארים לעצמם שגם הם יום אחד יזדו שם ועל כן מגיע להם ה"ישר כוח" האמיתי של הבחירות האלה.

Thank You for Smoking

Tasmania is home to Australia's oldest synagogue

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

HOBART, Tasmania — Despite its tiny population, the Jewish community of Hobart the capital of Australia's only island state offers a choice of Shabbat worship services. Every second Saturday there is a short "progressive" service; following it is the regular weekly Orthodox service.

Caroline Heard, president of the Hobart Hebrew Congregation until last month, deserves credit for the harmonious arrangement, according to Pnina Clark, who with her husband, David, serves as Hobart's de facto Chabad emissary.

Caroline Heard

Their synagogue is the oldest in Australia, with backless wooden benches – once reserved for convicts shipped from Britain in the 1800s – supplementing more comfortable high-backed wooden pews. In all, there are 150 seats downstairs, and 45 in the women's gallery.

A well-preserved structure fronted with tall trapezoid-shaped windows, the synagogue was built 160 years ago in neoclassical Egyptian style, even incorporating palm-tree- shaped columns.

"We've gone from candlepower to gas to electric," Heard told a small group of visitors on a mild Tasmanian spring day last November.

Pointing out the elaborate chandelier over the bimah, she told of the synagogue's July 4, 1845, consecration in Hobart Town, as the city was then known. "It was the middle of winter. It would have been cold and dark… I reckon they used a heck of a lot of candles that day."

Heard, a native of Plymouth, England, who moved to Australia in 1971, has spent the last dozen or so years in Hobart but is moving to Melbourne this month. The 160th anniversary concert she organized at the synagogue last November featured a rearrangement of the music composed by Catholic bandmaster Jacob Reichenberg for the building's opening.

Because the governor of Van Diemen's Land – the name by which Tasmania was originally known – would not grant land for a non-Christian institution, Judah Solomon, a local Jewish merchant and pardoned convict, donated his garden. His stately home, known as Temple House, still stands next to the synagogue and is owned by state police.

From the time the synagogue's foundation stone was laid in August 1843, it took two years – and help from Sir Moses Montefiore – to complete the building. The famed British Jewish philanthropist raised money for the congregation when locals ran low on funds.

Donors and the amounts they provided, in British pounds, are listed on the back wall in gold script. Prominently displayed on a side wall is the prayer for the Royal Family.

In recounting the synagogue's early history, Heard notes an unusual halachic issue whether or not convicts could be honoured with aliyot or included in a minyan, the traditional prayer quorum. After consultation with the chief rabbi of England, it was determined that they could be counted in the minyan but not called to the Torah, she said.

Hobart's current Jewish population comprises an eclectic group, many of whom are married to non-Jews. There is at least one Israeli, an Algerian couple, university students from elsewhere, and a woman who was a classmate of Anne Frank's as a child. Their class picture is on display at the synagogue, which has about 50 individual members.

A Chabad rabbi comes in for the High Holy Days, life-cycle events and the occasional service. Progressive rabbis also visit, on an irregular basis.

According to Australia's last census in 2001, Tasmania has about 165 Jews. There were more than 400 in Hobart alone in 1848, but most of the original Jewish families either left Judaism or left the city, said David Clark.

After World War II, he noted, the community was "repopulated" by European immigrants.

As Orthodox Jews, the Clarks are a minority within a minority on the scenic island whose license plates bear the slogan "Tasmania – Your Natural State." Launceston, about 200 kilometres to the north of Hobart, has a Chabad House.

The couple lives on a hilly street lined with prewar houses fronted by flowering gardens. They have hosted many Jewish backpackers looking for a kosher meal or a place to sleep. In fact, their home is listed in the phone book as the Jewish Centre. Pnina runs a small Hebrew school and began her first Jewish playgroup last fall.

It is only "by default," according to Pnina, that they are Chabad emissaries. Their presence in Hobart predates their affiliation with Chabad in the early 1980s.

David was born and raised in Hobart. Pnina emigrated from Hungary at age 8 with her family in the late 1950s. She is the daughter of the late Rabbi Jacob Joseph Schick, a former congregational rabbi in Melbourne.

In Tasmania, it's harder being observant. Kosher food is scarce, and Jewish day schools don't exist. When their children reached high school age, the Clarks sent them to Melbourne, where they eventually settled, to continue their education.

"Anything kosher, we get from Melbourne," said Pnina. "I closed down my milchik sink until Shavuot."

Among the more memorable moments of Jewish life in Hobart, David recalls the time he was called on to help move about 50 bodies from the site of the colonial Jewish cemetery, which was sold decades ago, and reinter them in the Jewish section of Hobart's community cemetery.

"With six skeletons in the car, I was hoping I wouldn't get pulled [over] for any reason," he said.

Australian ANZAC biscuits are easy to prepare

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Living in Toronto as part of a diverse, multicultural population, we have become familiar with many different types of cuisine.

That is why I was intrigued to be offered a dessert I'd never heard of at the Shabbat table of Australian friends in Melbourne last November.

ANZAC biscuits – the acronym stands for Australian and New Zealand Army Corps – may not be exotic, but they're easy to prepare, go well with a cup of tea, and have an interesting history that dates back to World War I.

Next week, on April 25, Australians and New Zealanders will mark ANZAC Day, a public holiday that is the anniversary of the date ANZAC troops landed on the Gallipoli Peninsula in 1915. That day, now commemorated with dawn and daytime ceremonies, marked the start of an eight-month campaign resulting in 25,000 Australian casualties, according to Australia's government website.

The pseudo-national biscuits – as aussieslang.com refers to them – were sent to the troops during both world wars by women on the "home front."

A few days after our dinner in Melbourne, I saw packaged ANZAC biscuits at a grocery store in Tasmania, Australia's island state.

When I returned to buy some as gifts, a fellow visitor to Hobart gave me an impromptu history lesson as we walked to the shop and discussed the biscuits and the ANZACs. Vera Goldberg, a former teacher who is involved with the Sydney Jewish Museum and its Holocaust education programs, also advised me that it would be easy to make the cookies myself.

Once we got to the store, she searched the aisles to find a bag of rolled oats with the ANZAC biscuit recipe on the packaging. She then read it to me while I wrote the instructions in my notebook – right there in the cereal aisle.

Vera Goldberg, who lives in Sydney, recommends the ANZAC biscuit recipe on the rolled-oats package she is holding. [Frances Kraft photo]

Although Vera suggested that I buy a jar of golden syrup to use in the recipe, I figured that readily available corn syrup would be an acceptable substitute if I wanted to make the cookies at home. But when I found golden syrup, by chance, in a Toronto store, I set out to recreate the authentic recipe.

Recently, I served it to an Australian guest at our Friday night table. Apparently, my cookies were smaller than the Australian version, but otherwise, it seems they passed muster.

ANZAC BISCUITS

Other variations are available online. Mim Gunn, whose son and daughter-in-law had us over for dinner in Melbourne, favours a recipe called South African Crunchies, which is simplified by using a square pan to make slices instead of individual cookies. She uses castor sugar instead of brown sugar, and the amounts of coconut and syrup are modified slightly. Baking time for the squares is 25 minutes.

The recipe that follows is from the rolled-oats package.

1 cup oats
1 cup flour
1 cup lightly packed brown sugar
3/4 cup desiccated coconut
4 oz. butter or margarine
2 tbsp. golden syrup
1 tsp. baking soda
3 tsp. boiling water

Blend oats, flour, sugar and coconut. Melt butter or margarine and syrup. Dissolve soda in water. Add to butter and syrup. Stir into oat mixture. Drop by tablespoon onto greased tray. (They spread.) Bake at 300, 15 to 17 min. (10 to 12 min. convection). Will harden. Cool 5 minutes.

Enjoys lifestyle in Hobart

David and Pnina both perform chevra kadishah duties, preparing Jewish bodies for burial. "It's difficult here, because often you know them," Pnina said.

Pnina, who has a master's degree in psychology, also finds time to counsel pregnant women and women in crisis, working with a group of Christian women

"I believe it's important for us to do things for the general community," she said. "The Jewish community doesn't need me full time."

Although it would be nice to have more Jewish amenities, David said he likes the lifestyle in Hobart.

"In about 10 minutes, you can be in the bush, away from all the houses. You can't do that in many cities."

Jewish candidate accused of 'conflict of interest' in UWO election

By KYLE GORDON
Special to The CJN

The University of Western Ontario's student council election was marred by controversy after an e-mail from a Palestinian group claimed a Jewish candidate had a conflict of interest.

Executive members of Western's Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights Club (SPHR) expressed concern that Noah Farber, a candidate for the 2006-07 position of vice-president of finance and clubs, has a history of working against Palestinian human rights.

The e-mail was sent to the University Student Council (USC) on March 17, the day before it voted for the position of vice-president of finance.

It stated: "Mr. Farber is the president of the Israel Action Committee (IAC) and has a blatant conflict of interest with the SPHR goals of basic human rights for Palestinians. It would be unfair and deleterious to SPHR to grant Mr. Farber access to SPHR financial records and planned activities."

Farber said the USC president informed him that Dario Kuzmanovic, president of the SPHR, had sent out the e-mail on behalf of the SPHR executive.

"The e-mail was essentially drawing a lot of conclusions, making a lot of statements that were factually untrue and essentially trying to coerce voters not to vote for me," Farber said.

Matt Fisher, the 2004-05 IAC president and a law student at UWO, said that rather than trying to build support, SPHR was simply taking someone's hard work and trying to damage it.

Fisher said Farber was targeted because he is the president of the IAC. "The SPHR couldn't stand to see a leader in the Jewish community become a leader in the student community.

"SPHR stands separately from all other campus groups in their unwillingness to participate in the larger student community and their dedication to simply attack others who don't fall in line with their views," Fisher said.

The March 18 election resulted in a tie between Farber and Alison Todd. According to the USC bylaws, a tie is decided by a coin toss. Todd won.

Immediately following the election, Farber filed an appeal. In it he stated that the e-mail sent by SPHR brought the election into disrepute. He argued that he was unable to run a fair campaign with the e-mail circulating.

His appeal was eventually accepted, and a new election date was scheduled for March 29.

A few days before the second election, members of the SPHR sent an e-mail to the incoming USC board members. It said: "Despite being asked to declare a conflict of interest in the hearing against SPHR, he [Farber] refused to do so."

At that point, Farber said he felt the need to address the issue.

In an e-mail, he stated that the conflict of interest SPHR was referring to was his membership on the Clubs Policy Committee, which filed a complaint when SPHR celebrated the United Nations International Day of Solidarity, on Nov. 29, 2004, by erecting a mock Apartheid Wall at Western.

"Apparently, my candidacy is not as a result of hard work and desire to serve the students of Western, but rather the result of a massive conspiracy," Farber wrote.

"My only saving grace is that they [SPHR complaints] are so bizarre, at least they make clear the scary extremes to which these people have decided to try to skew the elections."

No longer a member of students' council

Dave Forestell, the legal affairs officer on the USC and a voting member in the election, said "it is fair to say, having read the confidential minutes, that at no point was Noah asked to declare a conflict of interest... All members of the committee were told at the beginning of the meeting [hearing] that if they felt they were in a conflict, they should declare that conflict. However, at no point did anyone ask him to declare a conflict."

When the votes from the second election were tallied, Farber did not win and is therefore no longer a member of the USC.

"At the end of the day, I'm obviously disappointed. To have your candidacy undermined by a group who is so concerned with one element of my life is frustrating. There is no doubt that the purpose of the e-mail was to raise doubt about my candidacy by any means necessary. It was obviously successful," Farber said.

Kuzmanovic said he is pleased with the results. "We are obviously happy. It would be unfair for us to operate under bias. If Noah Farber was the vice-president of finance, he would have access to the planned activities, financial records and membership list of SPHR."

Now that the election is over, Farber wants to ensure that Jewish students on campus feel comfortable running for board of directors positions.

"As a Jewish leader on campus, I feel that it is my responsibility to help work for future generations of Jewish leaders," he said.

CJC objects to Bibles being distributed to students

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Canadian Jewish Congress has added its voice to parents' objections that the Gideon Society's distribution of Christian Bibles to students in a Vancouver-area public school system is inappropriate.

The Gideon Society, a lay association of Christians, has offered free Bibles to Grade 5 students across Canada since the 1940s, and in the Richmond School District since at least the 1960s.

But last month, a handful of parents objected to Richmond's school trustees, saying the distribution of the Bibles is inappropriate in a school system populated by children of many religions and denominations.

Typically, 50 students in the district's 38 elementary schools request a Bible in any given year, while the rest pass on the offer, said Richmond School District superintendent Bruce Bearsto

In an interview with the Richmond Review, school board chair Linda McPhail said the Bibles are not handed out to students. Parents who want their children to receive one must fill out a form that the board includes in newsletters, and return it to their child's school

She added that most e-mails she's received on the issue support the practice

Nevertheless, CJC is against it

"We don't see that there's any benefit in not communicating a very firm boundary when it comes to the public school system and the ability of certain denominations to effectively proselytize," said Mark Weintraub, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Pacific region. "A position which is not firm will encourage the most aggressive religions to promote their particular sacred texts."

But Beairsto insisted that the Gideon Society's offer to distribute free Bibles is no big deal.

"I don't believe anyone here is passionately wedded to the idea of distributing Bibles through the school district, but we just didn't see any reason to oppose it," he said. "The practice is long-standing and has not previously been raised as contentious."

"We have no particular axe to grind or position to defend, but at this time, our best judgment about how to live our inclusive ideals suggests that past practice is acceptable and there's no compelling reason to change it," he added. "That is not to say that we will not do so in the future, but to be honest, there are far more urgent challenges vying for our attention."

Beairsto said that if other religions come forward and wish to offer students their respective holy books, he would welcome it.

One Muslim parent in Richmond, Abdullah Ali, is reportedly doing just that he is obtaining Qur'ans to distribute to students who request them

But Weintraub said that unless they're being used as part of the curriculum, religious texts only belong in a public school's library

"We're totally opposed to an ad hoc process of disseminating information of religious teachings other than in an academic framework," he says. "It must be part of an overall teaching curriculum, and must not be left to those groups – be they Buddhist, Zoroastrian or anything else – to create an advantage of one faith over another in the public school system."

"If the library of this school should house the world's collection of sacred texts, we'd be supportive of that, but it must be undertaken in a spirit of academic and objective pursuit of knowledge, and without any underlying proselytizing motivation."

Each year, the Gideons distribute more than 63 million Bibles to schools, hotels, hospitals and prisons worldwide, its website says.

Other Vancouver-area boards do not allow the Gideons to distribute Bibles to students.

Beairsto said the Richmond school board does not promote any particular faith.

"We try to be accepting of everyone. For example, we provide rooms for Muslim students to pray, we sing songs from all traditions in December, and so on," he said.

How your child can be successful in Grade One

Helpful hints for fostering an enthusiastic learner

TORONTO — Parents, educators and guidance counselors agree that the transition to grade one should be smooth and enjoyable. So, what can you do to prepare your child for Grade One?

Lisa Adler, grade one teacher at Bialik Hebrew Day School, says: "Don't worry about whether your child reads, rather focus on promoting independence. Don't do for your children what they can do for themselves."

Debra Danilewitz, Bialik's school counselor, agrees. Her advice? "Give your children the opportunity to be independent. If your children can't make their own beds, encourage them to at least put the pillow in the right spot. Buy shoes and coats children can do up alone."

As the parent of a grade one student, Nicole English was surprised at how quickly her son adapted. He brings home his homework folder each night — and it's organized with the "Stay at Home" work on the left side and "Bring Back" on the right side. Through this type of teaching, the children begin the lessons of organization and responsibility.

Another parent, Michelle Freedman, wondered how her child would be able to sit at a table all day. She quickly discovered that children at Bialik are exposed to a variety of ways of learning. While some work is done at their desks, either independently, or in small groups (where they make new friends), other learning is done through experiential tasks on the carpet, at "centres", or even in the playground.

Freedman says, "I was amazed at how the Hebrew instruction was done using gross motor skills – not just sitting at a desk!"

Of course, by this time of year, grade one students are reading and writing (in Hebrew and English) and developing math and science skills. They've developed friendships and have grown into independent people. In the photo above, Bialik grade one students take part in the Celebration of Hebrew Letters.

Winnipeg's Asper Campus set to get a facelift

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — With most of the money from a $7.5-million fundraising campaign in hand, Winnipeg's Asper Jewish Community Campus is preparing for the next step: a redesign of the complex's interior.

In 2004, the Asper Campus launched a campaign to pay off its remaining debt, reconfigure its interior space and double the size of its endowment fund to help pay future maintenance costs.

The campaign has raised $7.1 million to date, and campaign co-chair Larry Hurtig said he's pleased that a significant number of donors are under age 50 and that many are community members who didn't contribute to the campaign to build the facility, which opened in 1997.

Among the major donors this time around are the federal and provincial governments – which have each contributed $750,000 – and the Asper family and Asper Foundation, who contributed $1 million.

The changes scheduled to take place include the downsizing of the Marion and Ed Vickar Jewish Museum of Western Canada, which is losing its exhibition space by the front entrance (future exhibitions will be displayed in cases along the campus' main concourse), as well as the relocation of the Kaufman/Silverberg Library from the basement of Gray Academy (Winnipeg's main community day school) to the former museum site.

Also planned is a move of the Aleph Bet Child Life Enrichment day care program to the former library space; the expansion of the Rose and Max Rady Jewish Community Centre's fitness area and locker room; and the creation of a more park-like entrance for the campus building itself.

Hurtig, the president of the Asper Campus board, compared the campus to a home that needs upgrading every few years. He also noted that membership in the campus' Rady JCC, at about 5,300, is beyond the centre's capacity and more than double the original estimates of its eventual size that were made when the campus opened in 1997.

The announced changes have caused some unhappiness, particularly among some supporters of the museum, whose allocation from the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg was significantly scaled back last year.

However, Barry Shenkarow, the Asper Campus president, noted that the boards of all the stakeholder organizations were involved in the decision-making process.

Shenkarow chaired a forum in late March for Asper Campus employees to explain the changes to them and answer their questions.

"There were a lot of questions," he said. "Some people wanted to know why we aren't just adding onto the building. That would have been too costly."

He said the first phase of renovations are slated to begin in June and will involve relocating the library, the museum and the day care.

"We hope that will be finished by September," he said. "We will work on the Rady Centre when the centre is having a slow period [after the summer], so as to not cause too much disruption."

17th Knesset sworn in Monday

Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Following Monday's terror attack in Tel Aviv in which nine Israelis were killed and dozens more wounded, Israel's 17th Knesset began its swearing in ceremony.

Not all participants agreed, however, that Knesset members should be taking part in a celebration on such a day.

Shas chair Eli Yishai called on Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin to postpone the ceremony, saying, "This is not a day for celebrating. The Knesset must feel the fear that the people who are travelling throughout the country are feeling on chol hamoed."

Interim Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said, "We intended to open the first session of the Knesset and the faction in a better mood. It's a harsh attack. I wish a quick healing to the wounded and our condolences to the victims."

Former prime minister Ariel Sharon's chair in the Knesset plenum was to stand empty during Monday's swearing-in ceremony, as a reminder of the changing political tide marking the opening of the 17th Knesset.

Knesset spokespeople expressed uneasiness at the shift from a government led by a dominant party of 40 MKs with a larger-than-life leader to one headed by a newly created party of 29 MKs, Knesset.

"The truth is that the vacancy is so much bigger than that one chair. So many well-known, veteran MKs are not returning. There is a question of how the new class of MKs will be guided," one spokesperson said.

But veteran MKs told the Jerusalem Post they were happy to see the end of the 16th Knesset, which they characterized as a low point in the Parliament's history because of the number of corruption charges filed against MKs.

"The 16th Knesset was the worst term I remember since I came to the Knesset in 1984," said Ran Cohen of the Meretz party, who will take the oath of office on Monday for the seventh time. "I'd like to believe the 17th Knesset is going to be better."

With prayer and song, 120 MKs from 12 different parties were to be sworn in. There are 41 new faces and two recently created parties, Kadima and the Gil Pensioners party, both elected for the first time.

Some faction configurations have also shifted. Israel Beiteinu, which sat in a joint faction with the National Union in the 16th Knesset, now sits alone, with 11 members.

The National Religious Party, in contrast, will be joined with the National Union faction in the 17th Knesset, instead of acting on its own as it did in the 16th Knesset.

Absent from the Knesset is the secular Shinui party, which was the third-largest party in the 16th Knesset with 15 MKs. None of its members were re-elected.

Starting with the words, "I am honoured to open the first session of the 17th Knesset," President Moshe Katsav addressed the assembly.

Members also heard from acting Speaker Shimon Peres, who, as the oldest member, serves as the interim head of the Knesset until a permanent one is elected.

Knesset secretary Arye Hahn, who has been through this ceremony a number of times in the last decade, said he always finds it emotional. He spent the day going over all the preparations to ensure that the event would move like clockwork.

In spite of Olmert's prediction that he will construct a large coalition that will keep the government in place for four years, talk behind the scenes anticipates a considerably darker stage.

"There is a lot of joking around not to put away the election hats so fast. They may come in handy sooner than we think," said a Knesset spokesperson. "People are even saying that within a year we'll have elections again... It's all the small parties – they are nervous that things are going to fall apart with so many cooks in the kitchen."

One high-ranking Knesset spokesperson said all of the parties are feeling the lack of a "Knesset star" to turn to.

"Many of the new MKs are feeling like they are being asked to go from stagehand to centre stage," he said.

Top on the legislative agenda is passage of the 2006 budget, which must be approved within 45 days from the time Olmert is sworn in. Labor MK Isaac Herzog is already asking the plenum to debate a host of social legislation items, including improving housing rights for the disabled.

IDF: Iran diplomacy now doubtful

By YAAKOV KATZ and HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — With projections that Iran could develop a nuclear bomb within 2½ years, Tehran's announcement last week that it has successfully enriched uranium proves diplomatic efforts to stop its race to the bomb have failed, says a high-ranking Israel Defence Forces (IDF) military intelligence officer.

"The way it looks now, it is doubtful that the United Nations and the international effort will succeed in stopping Iran," the officer told the Jerusalem Post over the weekend. "Iran spit in the world's face, but the world hasn't done anything."

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad

Last Friday, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad fired a series of verbal shots at Israel, saying the Jewish state is a "permanent threat" to the Middle East that will soon be eliminated, and questioning the validity of the Holocaust.

"Like it or not, the Zionist regime is heading toward annihilation," Ahmadinejad said at the opening of a three-day conference in Tehran in support of the Palestinians, attended by Hamas members, including party leader Khaled Mashaal. "The Zionist regime is a rotten, dried tree that will be eliminated by one storm," Ahmadinejad said.

Although Israel had no official response to Ahmadinejad, former Israeli prime minister Shimon Peres said the Iranian president's words were reminiscent of those of Saddam Hussein, and that his "end will be similar."

Peres issued a statement saying Ahmadinejad "represents Satan, and not God." History, he said, has denounced "madmen and those who wave the sword, and all those who acted this way ended their careers accordingly."

Peres added, however, that Israel needs to let the United States and the international community lead the campaign to protect the world from the Iranian leader.

"Iran is a United Nations member state threatening another UN member state, and the international organization will not let this go unheeded," Peres said in an Israel Radio interview Saturday.

"The Iranian president is uniting the entire world against him," he said. "Israel is following his statements and actions closely, but does not wish to respond to them."

Indeed, the Foreign Ministry had no response Saturday night to Ahmadinejad's comments.

On Tuesday last week, Ahmadinejad announced that Iran had passed one of the major hurdles in its race to obtain nuclear power and had, for the first time, successfully enriched uranium.

But while a battery of only 164 centrifuges was used to enrich the uranium to 3.5 per cent, the IDF officer said, it is only a matter of time before Iran has technology that will allow for the operation of thousands of centrifuges over a period of several months, which could produce highly enriched uranium at 90 per cent the amount needed for a nuclear bomb.

The officer said Iran is in the process of developing nuclear arms in a separate program, parallel to and alongside the Islamic republic's publicly known nuclear program, which Iran claims is for civilian, peaceful purposes.

"It is more probable that they have a second and secret plan [to develop nuclear arms] and they will copy the technology they are now developing in the open and use it in a secret location," the officer said.

Iran, the officer predicted, would obtain independent research and development capabilities – sometimes referred to as the "point of no return" – in a matter of months, technically allowing it to move forward with its nuclear program without external assistance.

"Once they succeed in enriching uranium at 3.5 per cent, there is nothing really technologically stopping them from enriching at 90 per cent," he said.

But after successfully enriching uranium, Iran's next test would be to operate thousands of centrifuges for more than just a few days. "The goal is to keep them going for several months without their breaking down or falling apart," he explained. "The fact that they know how to do it for several days is not enough."

While Israel needs to fear a nuclear attack by Iran, the threat is shared by the entire world and needs to be dealt with appropriately, the officer said. Tough and immediate sanctions could still potentially suspend Iran's nuclear program, he added.

"The diplomatic efforts made until now have been exhausted," he said, "and it is time for a diplomatic process with sharp teeth."

Ahmadinejad provoked a world outcry last October, when he said Israel should be "wiped off the map."

On Friday, he repeated his earlier statement about the Holocaust, saying: "If such a disaster is true, why should the people of this region pay the price? Why does the Palestinian nation have to be suppressed and have its land occupied?"

The land of Palestine, he said, "will be freed soon." He did not say how this would be achieved, but insisted to the audience of at least 900 people: "Believe that Palestine will be freed soon. The existence of this [Israeli] regime is a permanent threat [to the Middle East]. Its existence has harmed the dignity of Islamic nations."

Halimi kidnapping suspects surrender

PARIS — Two suspects surrendered last week in connection with the kidnapping and murder of a young French Jew.

A 19-year-old man, identified by the Le Figaro newspaper as Jean-Christophe S., has confessed to participating in the abduction of Ilan Halimi, 23, who died from torture inflicted on him by a gang of kidnappers.

The leader of the "Gang of Barbarians" who carried out the crime, Yossouf Fofana, who is in the custody of Paris police, says Jean-Christophe was not merely an accomplice but a partner in the crime.

A young man in his 20s, identified as Yassin N., also turned himself in April 10. He is suspected of having dealings with Jean-Christophe, but denies involvement in the kidnapping.

There currently are 22 suspects under investigation in the case, 18 of them in police custody.

Nine killed in suicide bombing

Olmert said that Israel was investigating what exactly had occurred and who was responsible, and also wished a speedy recovery to the wounded and condolences to the families of victims.

The new Hamas-led Palestinian Authority government called the suicide bombing a legitimate response to Israeli "aggression."

"We think that this operation… is a direct result of the policy of the occupation and the brutal aggression and siege committed against our people," said Khaled Abu Helal, spokesperson for the PA Interior Ministry.

Earlier, Moussa abu Marzouk, a Hamas leader abroad, told Al-Jazeera television that "the Israeli side must feel what the Palestinian feels, and the Palestinian defends himself as much as he can."

PA President Mahmoud Abbas denounced the attack, saying it harmed Palestinian interests, while Palestinian sources have reported that a large Israel Defence Forces contingent has entered the West Bank city of Nablus in response to the terror attack.

"President Mahmoud Abbas condemned the terrorist attack in the bus station in Tel Aviv that led to the killing and injury of many," his office said in a statement released by the official Palestinian news agency, Wafa.

Israel Briefs

Pope backs Israel, PA

Pope Benedict endorsed Israel's right to exist as well as Palestinian statehood hopes. "May the international community, which reaffirms Israel's just right to exist in peace, assist the Palestinian people to overcome the precarious conditions in which they live and build their future, moving toward the constitution of a state that is truly their own," the Pope said in an Easter Sunday speech at the Vatican. His remarks on Israel were seen as an indirect rebuff to calls by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for the Jewish state to be eliminated. Benedict also urged an "honest," negotiated solution to the international crisis caused by Iran's nuclear program.

Diplomats visit Indonesia

Two senior Israeli diplomats visited Indonesia. Israel's Foreign Ministry disclosed that the deputy head of its Asia desk, Amos Nadai, and Israel's ambassador to Thailand, Yael Rubinstein, made an official visit to Indonesia this month despite the absence of formal ties between the Jewish state and the world's most populous Muslim nation. The trip was made within the framework of a UN-administered trade conference in Jakarta. Nadai told Israel Army Radio that while he doesn't expect full ties with Indonesia to be established before there is an Israeli-Palestinian peace deal, Jakarta is interested in lower-level relations. Israel broke the ice with Indonesia by sending an aid airlift following the December 2004 tsunami.

Iran pledges aid to PA

Iran has announced it will donate $50 million (US) to the Palestinians, Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said in a televised speech to a conference on the Palestinian issue in Tehran. The conference was attended by leaders of several radical Palestinian groups, including Hamas and Islamic Jihad. At the conference, Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal said "the Palestinians will never recognize Israel," adding that there is no point in initiating talks with Israelis.

JTA and Jerusalem Post

Sharon's career over

Israel formally brought the comatose Ariel Sharon's political career to a close. Top government ministers convened last week to implement a constitutional law by which Sharon, who suffered a crippling stroke last January and is not expected to recover, would be designated "permanently incapacitated." Sharon, 78, is in intensive care at Hadassah Hospital in Jerusalem, but doctors may eventually move him to a long-term care centre.

Pollard swap in works?

U.S. and Israeli officials denied reports Israel plans to offer to free a jailed Palestinian militiaman if the United States grants clemency to Jonathan Pollard. Army Radio reported Sunday that Israel would make the proposal to swap Pollard for Marwan Barghouti, who is serving five life sentences for orchestrating Palestinian terror attacks, after interim Prime Minister Ehud Olmert forms a government. According to the report, Israel believes the United States could be interested in seeing Barghouti go free in order to bolster his Fatah party against the Palestinian Authority government under rival Hamas. U.S. and Israeli officials denied the report. Barghouti's lawyer welcomed the idea.

Arab killed for sale to Jews

Palestinian vigilantes killed a Jerusalem Arab they suspected of selling his home to Jews. Fatah gunmen claimed responsibility for shooting the 48-year-old father of seven, whose body was discovered in the West Bank last week. He was accused of being a traitor for selling his home in eastern Jerusalem's A-Tur neighbourhood to Jews. Residents reportedly refused the dead man's family permission to bury him in A-Tur.

Israeli Arab eyes Jerusalem

An Israeli Arab leader said Jerusalem will become an international Islamist capital. "Jerusalem will soon be the capital of a Muslim Arab caliphate, and all efforts by the Israeli establishment to Judaize the city will amount to nothing," Sheik Raed Salah, head of the Islamic Movement in Israel, told a weekend rally in Kfar Kassem.

New JTS chancellor weighs in on gay issue

By CHANAN TIGAY
JTA

NEW YORK — In his first interview with the Jewish media after being named the next chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS), Arnold Eisen told JTA he favours allowing gays and lesbians to become Conservative rabbis.

"My personal opinion is that I would like to see these processes end up with the ordination of gays and lesbians," he said. "But I might be outvoted."

The Conservative movement in recent years has been roiled by this hot-button issue. Its central halachic authority, the Committee on Jewish Law and Standards, has debated the issue at length and has scheduled a vote for December.

Still, Eisen said, despite pressures to resolve the issue, a change can't simply be imposed from above.

"There's got to be halachic process," he said. "You have to preserve the integrity, the authenticity of halachah."

He added: "The halachic process is non-negotiable."

Arnold Eisen

Eisen, 54, advocated a robust discussion among seminary faculty on homosexuality's place in the Conservative movement. He pointed out that such a discussion preceded the seminary's decision to ordain women in 1983.

"The faculty is going to have to decide how it wants to think about this issue," he said. "I just want to have a discussion. I just want to know how my colleagues feel about this."

A sociologist who has focused largely on American Jewry, Eisen was named chancellor last week after a lengthy search. He will succeed Rabbi Ismar Schorsch, who will step down in June after two decades in the position.

Eisen, a Jewish studies professor and chairman of Stanford University's religious studies department, is not a rabbi and will be just the second seminary head (there have been seven) without rabbinical ordination in JTS' 120-year history. The first, Cyrus Adler, led the school from 1915 to 1940.

A career academic, Eisen has a PhD from Hebrew University and also attended Oxford University. He is the author of, among other books, The Chosen People in America: A Study in Jewish Religious Ideology; and Rethinking Modern Judaism: Ritual, Commandment, Community.

He will serve a year as chancellor-designate before taking the reins full time in July 2007.

He comes to JTS at a time of some uncertainty for the movement.

Once the dominant religious stream on the U.S. Jewish scene, Conservative Judaism has been losing ground to the Reform movement and has sometimes seemed feckless in the face of an energized Orthodoxy.

The movement also faces dwindling numbers, a debate on the homosexuality issue and an identity crisis as it struggles to articulate a unified vision.

The search for chancellor reflected a larger struggle that has dogged the movement since its inception: between those who would adhere more strictly to halachah and those who are more willing to change tenets of religious observance to fit modern living. The choice of chancellor was seen as a barometer of which approach the movement would take in the years ahead.

Eisen is well-acquainted with the U.S. Jewish community, but some Conservative rabbis have expressed concern that a position sometimes likened to the movement's de facto chief rabbi will be filled by a non-rabbi. Eisen said he understands the concerns.

Some in the movement have suggested the chancellor's role as a halachic voice could be transferred elsewhere: perhaps to the head of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, the movement's synagogue arm; the head of the Rabbinical Assembly, the rabbinical arm; or a newly created position like a mara d'atra, a local halachic authority.

Eisen declined to speculate on whom this position might fall to. But he stressed that movement rabbis will find him to be a strong ally.

"I'm not one of these scholars who doesn't care about the rabbinate," he said. "You're going to find me a supersupportive chancellor for rabbinical students."

He added: "I think this is going to be good for the rabbis."

Eisen said he imagines a rabbinical school graduation ceremony in which he will ordain the movement's newest spiritual leaders "as a representative of the Jewish people and the Conservative movement in America," rather than as a rabbi ordaining another rabbi.

"I am a member of the communities they're going to be serving," he said. "And I like the symbolism of me representing these communities in ordaining these rabbis."

Eisen said the major challenge facing the movement is getting unconnected Conservative Jews more involved.

"How do you get them to be part of Jewish communities? How do you connect them?" he asked, noting that there's "a membership crisis" in the Conservative movement, which in recent years has been overtaken numerically by the Reform movement.

"But to me, with Jews in general, everybody worries about the declining numbers – but half the Jews we have are not connected."

"With camps, with schools, with synagogues, the challenge is to make the meaning so real, so palpable, that people want to come back for more."

Historically, Conservative Judaism arose as a middle-ground between traditional Orthodox Judaism and American modernity – a function that is no longer needed.

Becomes only second non-rabbi to head main Conservative seminary

"No Jews anymore have trouble being fully a part of American life, and many Jews don't know about tradition," he said. "So you have to attract them from square one. You have to persuade them that this way of being is a good, substantial way of leading a Jewish life."

Eisen said his first responsibility as chancellor will be to the seminary rather than the movement as a whole. There will be a focus on scholarship, on applying that scholarship to Jewish life, on training students in each of JTS' schools and in raising funds necessary to accomplish these goals, he said.

Still, he said, he hopes to play a role in the Conservative movement at large.

"One of my goals for the Conservative movement is that I want there to be a stronger leadership," he said, adding that leaders of movement branches need better resources. "I'm hoping to get many of my colleagues more involved in the Conservative movement than they have been."

He also said the movement's rank-and-file could play a broader role.

"We have people who are leaders in every area of life sitting in our congregations," he said. "They could make a contribution to the movement by bringing their expertises into dialogue with Judaism."

Eisen also lamented what he said was a growing chasm between U.S. and Israeli Jewry, and said that as one of the leading American Jewish institutions, the seminary could play an important role in bridging the gap.

Movement insiders also have complained that Conservative Jewry has not articulated a coherent message to take into the world. Eisen agreed that this has been a concern, and suggested that the movement ought to articulate "a message of substance and ethics and Torah."

He said that many Jews believe that by observing mitzvot, or Jewish laws, they give up their autonomy.

"This is, frankly, nonsense," he said. "The message that mitzvah is far more wonderful than that, this message has not reached most Conservative Jews, unfortunately."

That's because many of them lack the background to understand this, he said. As such, education will play an important role in rectifying this misconception — and not just traditional education, but experience.

"You have to give them positive experiences time after time," he said.

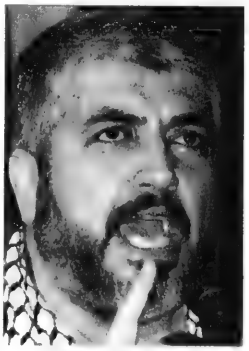
Hamas head Mashaal meets with Al Qaeda leader

By YAAKOV KATZ
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — In another sign of the Palestinian leadership's growing alliance with Al Qaeda, Damascus-based Hamas head Khaled Mashaal recently met in Yemen with a representative of the organization led by Osama bin Laden, the Jerusalem Post has learned.

During a visit to Yemen two weeks ago, the local Hamas branch organized a fundraising event to recruit financial aid for the new Hamas-led Palestinian Authority government. During the event, Mashaal met with Sheikh Abd al-Majid al-Zindani, who is suspected by the United States of being a loyalist to Osama bin Laden and a supporter of Al Qaeda. Zindani donated 200,000 Yemenite rials to Hamas, the equivalent of a little over $1,000 (US).



Khaled Mashaal

"This meeting reinforces the fact that Hamas and Al Qaeda come out of the same ideological wellspring of global jihad and the Muslim Brotherhood," said former Israeli ambassador to the United Nations Dore Gold, whose Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs carefully followed the meeting and recently published a paper on the Hamas-Al Qaeda alliance. "They still share the same financial infrastructure to this day," he said.

At the fundraising event, Zindani praised Hamas suicide bombers and called on his followers to donate money to assist the Palestinian people. "The Hamas government is the Palestinian people's government today," he told a crowd of several thousand. "It is the jihad-fighting, steadfast, resolute government of Palestine."

In 2004, U.S. authorities designated Zindani as a terror supporter and a spiritual figure for bin Laden. Zindani, the authorities claimed, played a key role in the 2004 purchasing of weapons on behalf of Al Qaeda and other terrorist groups.

"The U.S. has credible evidence that Zindani, a Yemeni national, supports designated terrorists and terrorist organizations," a statement released by the U.S. Treasury Department said. "Zindani has a long history of working with bin Laden, notably serving as one of his spiritual leaders. In this leadership capacity, he has been able to influence and support many terrorist causes, including actively recruiting for Al Qaeda training camps."

Senior Israel Defence Forces officers have confirmed that Al Qaeda has already established terror cells in the Gaza Strip and has begun working on creating a similar infrastructure in the West Bank. Maj.-Gen. Yitzhak Harel, head of the IDF's planning directorate, told the Post recently that Al Qaeda was operating within the PA territories.

"Al Qaeda is about money," he said. "There is always a flow of funds to terrorism in the territories and it is difficult to get our hands on the money."

Last week, the London-based Al Hayat newspaper reported that 10 Al Qaeda activists who had recently entered the Gaza Strip from Egypt had been captured by PA security forces. Citing Jordanian security sources, the paper said that the cells were in the midst of planning "large-scale" terror attacks on sensitive and strategic targets – possibly the crossings from Gaza into Israel.

Going to shul may help you live longer

By GEORGE CONGER
Jerusalem Post

Weekly attendance at religious services can add up to three years to your life, a new U.S. medical study has found.

Dr. Daniel Hall of the University of Pittsburgh Medical Center, the author of the study published in the March/April issue of the Journal of the American Board of Family Medicine, compared the impact of regular exercise, statin (anti-cholesterol drug) therapy and religious attendance on life expectancy, and he found that each accounted for an additional two to five years of life.

Hall found that subjects who engaged in regular physical exercise tended to live 3 to 5.1 years longer. Those using statin medications lived 2.1 to 3.7 additional years, while those who regularly attended religious services lived 1.8 to 3.1 years longer.

"This is not to say that religious attendance should replace primary prevention, such as exercise or a proven drug therapy," Hall said. "But it does suggest that regular religious attendance is associated with a substantially longer life expectancy."

While Christians comprised the overwhelming majority of those examined in the U.S.-based study, observant Hindus, Muslims and Jews were also among the subject populations.

Hall told the Jerusalem Post that religious attendance "cannot be manipulated in the same way you can manipulate other things in health care," and he cautioned against making a facile conclusion about the health benefits of simply attending services.

"If you put your eggs in the basket of 'Get religion because it works,' you will end up with an empty basket," he said, arguing that religious belief should be viewed as a "demographic" factor, akin to race and ethnicity in looking at the health of an individual.

"Unlike other health behaviours, such as exercise, there are practical and ethical problems with recommending 'therapeutic' changes in religious behaviour, and there is no evidence that changing religious attendance causes a change in health outcomes," Hall said.

However, "something is going on here that deserves further consideration and further study," he said.

A graduate of Yale University's divinity school and its school of medicine, Hall noted that "medicine is not a pure science, it is a moral tradition. It is about discerning what would be good for a patient and then using available technology to achieve that good."

He added: "Science can never tell us what will be good. It has to be something that comes from our moral tradition and our moral discourse."

We need to reach higher

As baalei tshuvah, my husband and I have spent the past 15 years learning about our beautiful religion, stepping out into the unfamiliar territory of religious observance and striving to evolve, both spiritually and in terms of our personal character.

An essential component of Torah observance entails active involvement in elevating one's character. This takes commitment, dedication and a consistent effort. I remember the early growing pains of feeling like an uneducated novice with respect to our religion, and how awkward this felt, given that we were educated adults with expertise in our respective careers.

But we stuck with it, even though we were outside of our comfort zones, because we knew that we wanted to strive to reach higher. A good Jewish life has no room for complacency.

To be whole beings, we have to carry into all areas of our lives the training towards personal excellence that is infused into a Torah way of life. We have to reach outside of our comfort zones in our careers, our exercise regimes, our hobbies and our relationships with both loved ones and all others with whom we interact.

In our careers, we should endeavour to take on new challenges that defy acceptance of the status quo. This does not necessarily mean leaving our jobs. Within the framework of our current positions, we could offer to be involved in a special project, or ask for a change to a different department, make a lateral move or get involved with mentoring new hires.

Our growth should be a proactive endeavour that impacts all areas of our lives. Our relationships with our loved ones deserve constant attention and effort, but this effort should be extended towards all others, including our colleagues, friends, neighbours and teachers.

We should strive for progressive excellence and achievement in our exercise regime and in our hobbies, keeping in mind that as we grow older, we need to keep our bodies and our minds fine-tuned and well-oiled. Optimum health provides us with the energy and vigour we need to pursue personal greatness, and as we all know, striving to be our "ideal selves" is an ongoing journey that requires persistent activity and commitment, and therefore lots of energy.

As I write this – a week before Pesach – I know that last week, my focus was on career achievement, and I pushed myself beyond my comfort zone to reach greater mastery in something that I don't normally get the opportunity to address. The results don't matter that much, as long as I know that I did my best, given all of the variables and circumstances, and that I pushed ourselves just beyond where we left off last time.

This week, my focus will be on excelling at cleaning my house for Pesach, and then cooking all those special foods that the family looks forward to at this time of year! As we put our hearts and minds into preparing for this special Jewish holiday, the enjoyment of the actual holiday will be that much greater.

Next week, I will concentrate on gaining a deeper understanding and appreciation of the Pesach holiday and what our ancestors experienced, while trying to maximize my enjoyment of my family and loved ones who come to share this wonderful time of year with us.

After that? I am not sure yet, but I know I will do my best to strive just a bit higher in something. Do I have my "down days" like everyone else? Most definitely. But the key is to get over it, pick ourselves up and reach higher!

KOSHER COOKBOOK SELLING LIKE HOTCAKES

A cookbook launched by a Thornhill Jewish day school has become an international bestseller, raising more than $130,000 in profits so far for the school.

A new printing of Gatherings: Creative Kosher Cooking from Our Families to Yours has just come off the presses of New York-based Feldheim Publishers for distribution in the United States, England, Israel, South Africa, Australia and other foreign markets.

The book was created by a volunteer committee at NeTivot Hatorah Day School in late 2003. The project was the brainchild of Shawna Magence and Carol Lesser, two school mothers who aspired to create a first-class, professional cookbook that would raise funds for the school.

Sponsored by major food companies, volunteers amassed 900 favourite recipes submitted by families of the school, and tripled-tested each recipe. The 300 top choices include Sushi Pizza, Thai Mango Salad, Terra Chip Chicken, Nutty Bok Choy Salad and Peanut Butter Mousse Cake.

Jack Samuel and his wife, Marla Samuel, both real estate agents who have sent three children to the school, spearheaded marketing efforts last year after the book became a Canadian bestseller. With some applied Internet research and many direct sales calls, they expanded sales in Canada and shipped Gatherings to more than 80 book and Judaica stores in key markets in the United States. Sales doubled to more than 10,000 copies.

Last month, Feldheim produced another 5,000 copies of Gatherings for international distribution. The print run was conducted in Israel for cost efficiencies. "That's sort of a nice bonus for a Zionist day school, to be able to send business to Israel," Samuel said.

All funds from the sale of the cookbook go toward Netivot's operating expenses and help support its costly enrichment and remedial special educational programs. "It's very rewarding to see this book take off in foreign markets and knowing that other Jewish families are sitting down to meals that originated at NeTivot Hatorah in Thornhill," Samuel said.

The book is available locally for $39.99.

More Book News: In 1859, London critic David Masson noted ruefully that the pace of publishing had accelerated to the point where two new novels were being produced in London each week, making it impossible for a careful reader to keep up. Nearly a century and a half later, English literature is expanding at a frenetic pace, with newly published books being added to library shelves at a pace equivalent, so I've heard, to a car travelling along a highway at 100 kilometres an hour.

Thematically, Jewish literary publishing is also booming, as the row of recently received books on the shelf above my desk attests. Titles include:

• The City Man (Coach House Books), a novel by Toronto writer Howard Akler. Set largely in Toronto's Kensington Market during the Depression year of 1934, the story is a "darkly funny romance" between a (non-Jewish) Toronto Daily Star reporter and a (Jewish) female pickpocket who warily reveals some of the tricks of her trade to him.

• Drunk From the Bitter Truth: the poems of Anna Margolin, translated, edited and introduced by Shirley Kumove of Toronto. This State University of New York Press collection offers both Yiddish and English versions of Margolin's forgotten poetry, which deals with themes of anxiety, loneliness, sexual tensions and the search for identity.

• The Joys of Much Too Much, by Bonnie Fuller, formerly of Toronto. Lightly biographical, this over-the-top self-help bible from the queen of America's women's and gossip mags is meant as an inspirational book of encouragement and instruction for the Girl Who Wants It All. Its subtitle is, "Go for the big life – the great career, the perfect guy, and everything else you've ever wanted (even if you're afraid you don't have what it takes)."

• Lines of Truth and Conversation (Porcupine's Quill), a book of stories by Joan Alexander of Toronto's Eglinton-Bathurst neighbourhood. The tales reflect her "intelligent and sure-footed investigations of the darker side of urban life."

• The Violin Lover (Goose Lane Editions), by Susan Glickman. The author, formerly of Montreal and presently of Toronto, is a poet making her novelistic debut courtesy of this small Fredericton, N.B., publishing house. The story focuses on a secret love affair against the backdrop of the London Jewish community between the wars.

• What Time and Sadness Spared: Mother and Son Confront the Holocaust, by Roma Nutkiewicz Ben-Atar with Doron S. Ben-Atar. This Holocaust memoir, from the University of Virginia Press, moves from upper-middle-class Warsaw in the '30s to the death factories of Madjanek and Auschwitz, and thence to Israel

• The World to Come (Norton), by Dara Horn. A million-dollar painting by Marc Chagall is stolen during a singles' gathering and the unlikely thief is Benjamin Ziskind, who believes the painting formerly hung in his parents' living room. An intertwined plot, 80 years earlier, involves Chagall and the Yiddish novelist Der Nister. Not yet 30, the New Jersey-born Horn is on the cutting edge of modern Jewish fiction; her in-laws, the Schulmans, live in Winnipeg.

Youths learn to love Shakespeare in workshops

By ADAM MICHAEL SEGAL
Special to The CJN

William Shakespeare is surely the most enduring English playwright of all time, but when contemporary youths read his four-centuries-old plays, they often struggle to understand the words or relate to the messages.

"Eighty per cent of students' hands fly up when I ask who hates Shakespeare," says Marvin Karon, a teacher and professional actor in Toronto.

"So the first thing I tell them is don't worry about the language in Shakespeare you can't understand. He wasn't writing for the audiences of 2006 – he was writing for his day and age.

"And the second thing I do is tell them… a quote from T.S. Elliot, which is that a poem's meaning can be communicated before it is even understood and so can Shakespeare. So you don't need to understand every single word."

Karon puts this philosophy into practice through an initiative called Shakespearience, in which Shakespeare workshops led by experienced actors are held at schools.

Starting in 1998 as a 20-school pilot project, the program has blossomed into a 100-plus school endeavour involving more than 200 actors. It also now boasts summer camps and after-hours programs for underprivileged and at-risk kids.

On April 23, a special presentation showcasing Shakespearience will be presented to audiences at the Young Centre for The Performing Arts in Toronto's Distillery District.

Such celebrities as Lord of the Rings stars Brent Carver and Carly Street will be featured at the event.

"This gala is designed to be a coming out after eight years," says Karon.

"Actors will be performing brief scenes, kids from the workshops will also be doing scenes and it's 90 minutes of entertainment… that lets people see the impact we're having on kids' lives."

Ron Lea, who's been acting for more than 25 years, has done Shakespearience workshops several times and marvels at the influence it has on participants.

"Every time I go to a workshop, I just watch the eyes in the audience and I see a light go on for all of the kids," he relates.

"What's so beautiful about it is that it's interactive. The kids get up, Marvin gets them to ask questions and he instills confidence in the students."

During the workshops, the students and actors will typically read scenes from a play and then discuss them, in many cases likening themes to modern-day social phenomena. The workshops also focus on the particular language Shakespeare used.

"We'll use certain songs from today, such as those by… 50 Cent, and talk about how Shakespeare was trying to do the same kinds of stuff that goes on with rap."

Initially, the workshops were geared exclusively to high school students, but they now cater to students from grades 3 to 12.

To satisfy the growing demand, Karon's roster of actors is constantly expanding and he doesn't generally need to twist arms to enlist supporters.

"Actors want to be on stage so they can tell interesting stories to audiences," Karon says.

"These actors understand that if they can get kids plugged into Shakespeare, they'll develop audiences to perform to."

For tickets to the upcoming event, call 416-593-0094, ext. 400. More information about Shakespearience can be found at www.shakespearience.ca.

Chassidic Australian Jews fuse Judaism with electronica

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Four chassidic Jews in Melbourne, Australia, are proving that it is possible to be a dedicated student of Kabbalah and still create cutting edge electronic music.

The Underground Kabbalah Project, a band that records on the Australian-based Cookitup Records label, is made up of four "core" members – Noiyam Ha Shirmasher, DJ Tzsooris, MC Meshuganah, and MC Maccabi – all of whom are in their 20s and use an alias to hide their identities from the rest of the chassidic community who they fear would disapprove of the music they create.

Shirmasher, who spent six months in Canada in 2004 studying at different yeshivot in Montreal and Toronto, produces and writes the music, but he has great difficulty describing it.

"It's kind of electro-pop with big splashes of breaks, hip-hop, drum n' bass, mixed with psycho horn playing and chassidic melodies," he said.

"Sometimes though, I'll get some horn players or different cantors to do stuff."

Shirmasher said the reason he and his bandmates began to incorporate Jewish themes into this kind of music was that they felt suffocated by the community's many boundaries.

"Being frustrated with the closed-off nature of my community, combined with the need to experience some of the great things out there in the wide world" is what drew him and DJ Tzsooris to skip class and sneak off to record stores eight years ago, when they were 16.

Shirmasher said that once he became exposed to a whole new world of music, he saved some money and purchased a drum machine that he would practise on, hidden in his closet.

DJ Tzsooris did the same. With some of his bar mitzvah money, he bought himself turntables and a mixer.

But it wasn't until 2005 that they met the other two members of the group, MC Meshuganah and MC Maccabi, who offer "serious rhymes and word play," and signed with Cookitup Records.

The Underground Kabbalah Project put out its first single, Push It Forward, last September and Shirmasher said he is overwhelmed by the positive response.

"The first single, Push It Forward, has been played on more than 35 radio stations around Australia. It sold 300 copies through the group's website in about 12 weeks, and it's being released again on a compilation CD called Circuit Breaker in Australia, which will be out May 1," he said.

The group's second single, New Music Warriors, features [a sample from] the late Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, the Lubavitcher Rebbe for 44 years, and will be out soon, he added.

"This group and writing this music is also an incredible release, or even escape, for me," Shirmasher said.

"By fusing Jewish elements into accessible music, I suppose it kind of echoes an internal attempt to reconcile these two worlds."

He said members of the chassidic community in the Balaclava and Ripponlea areas of Melbourne, what he calls the "bagel belt," forced them into anonymity because he is certain they would not approve of their artistic expression.

"Specifically, they have a problem with our style of music. Many get offended by it. You know, we use drum machines, turntables, synthesizers. We bust rhymes. It's just not understood by the community as being a legitimate pursuit."

He said his parents have no idea that he is part of this group, and he plans to keep it this way.

"None of us are particularly keen on being disowned by our families. For them, having a son that plays this kind of music would be extremely shameful."

Although Shirmasher and DJ Tzsooris have been honing their craft for the past eight years, the group has yet to perform a live show. If they did, they would wear masks in order to conceal their identities, he said.

He added that if Canadians are interested in testing out their sound, they can visit www.cookituprecords.com to download the single for free.

Israeli films featured at Hot Docs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Gen. Dan Harel comforts a sobbing Gaza settler in 5 Days.

Israeli settlers in the Gaza Strip meet their match in a tough but sensitive major general. Israelis and Palestinians search for non-violent methods to resolve their conflict. A karate champion from an Israeli Arab village balances ambition with family obligations. Israeli senior citizens debate current events and philosophy. Israeli Lotharios cruise a Tel Aviv beach for women.

These are the themes of five Israeli movies scheduled to be screened at Hot Docs, the annual documentary film festival that runs from April 28 to May 7.

Yoav Shamir's 5 Days (April 30, 6:30 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema and May 4, 3:45 p.m. at the Royal Ontario Museum) humanizes the events surrounding the removal of Jewish settlers from Gaza last August.

The 94-minute film unfolds through the eyes of Dan Harel, the general in charge of the operation, and the settlers who resisted the Israeli government's order to leave peacefully.

Forty thousand soldiers and police were on hand to carry out the evacuation, the central drama in Israel's policy of unilateral disengagement from Gaza. Once the settlers were expelled, their homes were levelled by excavators.

The sight of these attractive Mediterranean-style cottages lying in utter ruins, as if in a war zone, cannot leave a viewer unmoved.

Both sides bring passion to their beliefs.

"There are no winners in this battle," Harel observes sadly at the outset. But Harel is hardly a cream puff. As tensions heighten, he instructs one of his commanders not to let himself become "a pawn" in the settlers' "ethos of resistance."

In a gut-wrenching scene, a bearded settler sobs, "This is the Land of Israel." As he collapses into Harel's arms, Harel gently pats his shoulder.

For those who did not witness last summer's events in Gaza, 5 Days is the next best thing.

Encounter Point (May 4, 7 p.m. at the Al Green Theatre and May 7, 4:30 p.m. at the Isabel Bader Theatre) aims a strong beam of light in a murky tunnel.

The film, by Ronit Avni and Julia Bacha, profiles Israelis and Palestinians who have been personally affected by the violence of the second intifadah and have somehow risen above it.

Encounter Point is about a group of families who recognize and share each other's pain and meet in a dialogue forum. At a time when despair and vengeance stalk the land, they strive to build bridges of understanding between the warring communities.

Inspiring at times, Encounter Point is proof positive that bitterness can be channelled into a force for good.

Roy Westler's Shadya (April 30, 4:15 p.m. at Innis Town Hall and May 7, 1:30 p.m. at the NFB Cinema) revolves around a high-spirited 18-year-old Israeli Arab Muslim woman named Shadya Zoabi.

Shadya, from the town of Tamra, is a talented athlete, a karate champion. Her father has been a source of encouragement, as has her apparently liberal fiancé, but her conservative older brother opposes her activities.

The film shows Shadya relaxing with her family at home, training with her Jewish teammates, competing at a championship in Durban, South Africa, and, in an impulsive prank left open to interpretation, wrapping herself in a Palestinian flag.

Once Shadya has been married, her husband reveals his true colours and discourages her from participating in further competitions. The baton passes to her younger sister, Waed, and Shadya becomes pregnant, her dreams of honing her athletic talents evaporating.

Westler's fine film is an engaging portrait of an unusual Muslim woman.

Tali Shemesh's The Cemetery Club (April 30, 1 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema and May 1, 4:30 p.m. at the Royal Ontario Museum) posits the assumption that old people can be vital and vibrant in their so-called golden years.

Every Saturday in summer on Mount Herzl, Israel's national cemetery in Jerusalem, a group of senior citizens sit on lawn chairs under the shade of a big pine tree to alleviate their loneliness and sharpen their minds in freewheeling discussions about current events, literature, poetry, philosophy and the like. When lunch is ready, a lady blows a whistle and a picnic begins.

Revolving around Lena, a perfectly coiffed and groomed Polish woman who still mourns her late husband, the love of her life, the movie is a tribute to the geriatric set.

Honi Hameagle's The Beach Boys (May 1, 7 p.m. at the Royal Ontario Museum and May 3, 4:15 p.m. at the Isabel Bader Theatre) introduces us to the crème de la crème of Tel Aviv beach society, the very masculine characters who relentlessly cruise for women.

In this sexually charged, amusing film, shot over a period of 30 years from 1975, these testosterone-powered men who remain juveniles at heart demonstrate their pickup techniques, make spectacles of themselves and offer crude observations about ethnicity, Arabs and manhood.

Simcha Simchovitch at 85

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Readers of the Yiddish Forward may have noticed several published notices in the New York-based newspaper a while ago congratulating Toronto poet and writer Simcha (Sam) Simchovitch for passing the milestone of his 85th birthday.

Simchovitch is known as one of Canada's senior Yiddish writers, yet he's also achieved recognition for his literary contributions in English and Hebrew. As of last year, he's also begun appearing in other languages. His autobiographical novel, Stepchild On The Vistula, was originally published in Yiddish in 1990 and translated into English in 1994; last year a Warsaw publishing house produced a Polish-language edition, complete with a laudatory introduction by Elie Wiesel.

A regrettable occupational hazard of every Yiddish writer is the inevitably small and declining readership attendant upon a dying language. Consequently, Simchovitch has published several collections of poems in his own capable English translation. He's also written some poems in English, prompting a Globe and Mail critic to commend him for doing "what very few poets have ever done - completed the transition from a native language to a new vernacular."

Simcha Simchovitch

> And like a child that weaves on his tiny feet > and walks, and falls, and tries again,
> I try anew my pen
> in English

The winner of various literary prizes including two Canadian Jewish Book Awards and two I.J. Segal awards for Yiddish literature, he is apparently not one to rest on his laurels. Mosaic Press recently published his translation of At the Mercy of Strangers: Survival in Nazi Occupied Poland, a Holocaust memoir that his aunt, Gitel Hopfeld, penned originally in Polish. His current projects include The Fiery Mountain, a proposed three-part collection of Yiddish and English poems about the shtetl of his youth, the Holocaust and Israel.

Despite philosopher Theodor Adorno's well-known proclamation that there can be no poetry after Auschwitz, Simchovitch has devoted a large segment of his literary output to the devastation of the Shoah, including such poems as Auschwitz Elegy, September 7, 1939, and Memorial Book.

He was born near Otwock, Poland, in 1921, grew up in Otwock and, as he describes in September 7, 1939, left his parents' home as German planes threatened death and ruin.

> I tie my bundle – two shirts,
> a worn out coat for winter, > few photographs, crumpled sheets > filled with Yiddish writing.
> Outside the house – my sobbing mom, > father, brother, sisters:
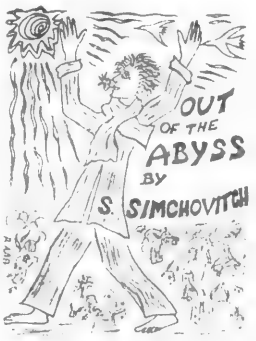
> we embrace, few words said,
> neighbours all around us.

The Nazis murdered most of the remaining Jews of Otwock in 1942: Simchovitch professes a sacred duty to bear witness and to remember. "My main goal in writing is to commemorate my parents who were killed in the Shoah – my little brother, my three sisters, my friends in the youth organization. I'm glad I was able to write about them in poetry, to immortalize them."

His self-proclaimed mission also includes writing about the vibrant Jewish life that existed in Poland in the interwar years (1918 to 1939), a period whose culture and history he claims has been overlooked. Shtetl literature by the likes of Sholem Aleichem elegantly captures an early time, but far fewer words have been written about Polish-Jewish life in the 20th century, he asserts.

"There were 3½ million Jews in Poland then. There was an intensive Jewish life, religious and secular. There was a youth organization, political organizations, sports clubs – there was so much. All of this dispersed, all of this was wiped out, and there was no time for the writers of the new generation to appear and to tell their stories. So this I felt was my main task – to recreate this life."



Having escaped the war in Siberia, he returned briefly to Poland after the war and saw first-hand the cruel devastation of his beloved hometown. He wrote his first poem in 1946 and his first collection, Thus a Youth Perished, appeared in 1950 after he and his wife had landed in Montreal. He worked in a leather factory for two years, took some courses at the Montreal Jewish Teachers Seminary, and taught cheder in Ottawa for six years. In the mid-'60s he and his family moved to Toronto, where he became curator of the Judaica Museum of the Beth Tzedec Congregation.

At the culmination of his studies, for which he earned a master's degree in Hebrew literature from the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, he wrote a Hebrew thesis on the 18th-century Jewish philosopher Solomon Maimon; it appeared in 1972. His other book-length work is Stepchild on the Vistula, an autobiographical novel of Polish-Jewish life, told in the third-person narrative voice of a fictional character.

"This I wrote in one summer, in about 10 weeks in Ottawa during a summer vacation. I went every day to the school and the school was closed, and I wrote every day. It [a draft manuscript] had been lying around for many years because I was studying. After my studies I dug it out and edited it."

Stepchild on the Vistula is based on a much earlier work that has apparently been lost. In the late '30s, Simchovitch responded to a campaign from the YIVO Institute, seeking autobiographical essays from young people. "I wrote down my story and sent it to them, then war broke out. Afterwards I tried to trace it at YIVO in New York. They have a list of submissions and my name is there, but my original is missing."

His poetry collections include Selected Poems (1990), A Song Will Remain (1994), The Remnant (1999) and Out of the Abyss (2003). He's also published The Song That Never Died, a collection of translated songs by Mordechai Gebirtig (2001); and After the Blood Inundation, a collection of Yiddish essays (2004).

Despite the images in many of these titles, he also writes on less solemn matters: the pleasures of life in Canada, for instance, even some lyrical poems about old age. Perhaps it is this lyricism and what critic Moishe Wolf has called "the special Jewish feeling of mercy" that most elevates his work. For all their dolorous subject matter, his poems also celebrate life.

> The cup nearly empty,
> I thirst for more,
> and count the bounty
> hour by hour.
> Like a scribe who pens
> a holy scroll,
> I sanctify the road
> and pay the toll.
> Because after all
> I say: "It was good!"
> My testimony
> to life a salute.

We hope that Simcha Simchovitch is permitted to record his joyous song for many more years to come.

NOW, MORE THAN EVER!

Israeli senior team faces hockey Mount Everest

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jean Perron has seen a lot of hockey in his day, and there's no way his innate optimism is going to trump his good judgement and sense of realism.

So you know he's serious when he jokes, "There's no doubt we won't move up this year."

Moving up in the International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) rankings is the ultimate goal for Perron and the Israeli hockey teams he coaches, and moving up is what the senior team did this year, advancing to IIHF Division I from II. They did so with an unexpected gold medal last year, defeating third-tier hockey countries like North Korea and Serbia and Montenegro.

As a result of last year's success, starting on April 24 in Amiens, France, the Israeli national senior team will face off against the world's second tier of hockey powers, including Great Britain, France, Germany, Hungary and Japan.

In their first game against Germany, they will likely face Washington Capitals goaltender Olaf Kolzig (.896 save percentage), Boston Bruin forward Marco Sturm (27 goals and 27 assists) and, if the San Jose Sharks miss the playoffs, Marcel Goc (seven goals, 12 assists).

"It's going to be a challenge just to win a hockey game and stay in Division I," Perron, the former Montreal Canadiens' bench boss, said on the telephone from Montreal. "We're only amateurs and they are all professionals. It's like climbing Mount Everest."

Perron, who worked some coaching magic to get the Israelis to Division I in the first place, believes the only chance the boys in blue have is to "play like a team and not dipsy-doodle so much."

Last year he had the team play a hybrid trap – a defence-first approach to the game – and he expects his players will again accept their assignments and put team play first.

Looking at his roster, Perron said only the Eizenman brothers – Alon, who played professional hockey in France last year, and Oren, who plays in the NCAA – have the talent to match up against the competition.

"We know our limitations," he said. "It won't be tough to get the players to agree to" the system.

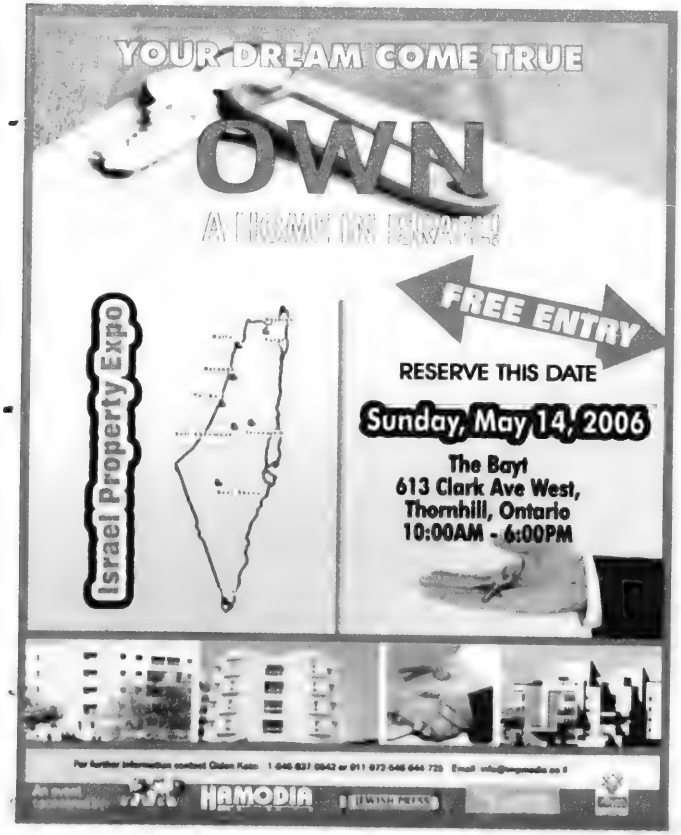
Alan Maislin, chair of the Ice Hockey Federation of Israel, said that in addition to the two Eizenman brothers, the team will rely on Max Birbraer, a 2000 third-round draft choice (67th overall) of the New Jersey Devils who plays for the Long Beach Ice Dogs of the East Coast Hockey League; the third Eizenman brother, Erez; and two other Canadian-based players, Daniel Spivak from Toronto and Montrealer Dimitri Levin. Levin is a defenceman with Val-d'Or in the Quebec Major Junior Hockey League. Spivak is a defenceman with the Stouffville Spirit of the junior A Ontario Hockey Association.

"Maybe we can sneak in a couple of wins," Maislin said. "We'll be young and strong going forward. Spivak and Levin could have played for the junior team."

The Israeli under-18 squad he was referring to recently captured a silver medal at a tournament in Romania and moved from Division III to Division II.

Since Perron took over as coach of the Israeli hockey teams, he's won three medals – a bronze and a silver at the junior level and a gold last year with the senior team – Maislin noted.

No doubt his skill as a coach will be sorely tested in Amiens.



Golf 2006, is this your year?

By DAVID GOODMAN
Special to The CJN

Oh yeah baby, this is the year! My wife just bought me that hot new Perfect Putter – only $350 – and a $600 Taylor Made Titanium 5000 super long driver. The tour guys are averaging 375 yards with it! I'm gonna murder it!

OK, so which of us ever stops hoping with this game? It's a new golf season, the grass is turning green and the grass is always greener… at least in our minds… until about the first round. I don't wish to put a dent in your dreams, but check the statistics. Even today, with all the great technology, balls that supposedly go as far as China and golf lessons that are video analyzed, 90 per cent of golfers still don't break 100.

The thing that bugs me is this: a decent, good-looking golf swing that produces a ball flight that soars high and straight is really easy to attain. Yes, I said easy. Seriously! I can get most beginners to hit the ball decently with their eyes closed. The secret? Getting out of your own way. The golf swing is as natural as throwing a ball.

Now, I'm not saying it's easy to shoot low scores. That takes commitment to practising your short game and developing the proper mental attitude. But if you can make your 2006 goal to do the things that enable you to make those nice high soaring shots, you'll get so excited you actually may start working on your short game.

If I took every four-year-old child in the world and tried to teach them how to throw a ball, a lesson would sound something like this: "Okay kids, extend your arm perpendicular to the horizon, fold your elbow 90 degrees downward, place 67 per cent of your weight on your right foot as you pronate your forearm, make a lateral hip move." Then I'd be saying: "God, can't you kids throw a ball?"

You get the point. Children learn to throw naturally because it's a natural motion. So is the golf swing. But we do need to learn the proper fundamentals such as posture and grip before we swing. A couple of lessons will put you in the proper positions to facilitate that easy swing, and also help correct all the nasty habits you may have picked up over the years.

So let's start our 2006 golfing season with some clear goals. Rather than spend hundreds of dollars on expensive drivers and golf balls may I suggest the following plan of attack:

- Buy new grips for your clubs.
- Take two or three lessons.
- Make practice fun.

Many of you are using grips from the '80s that are so shiny you can comb your hair looking in them. And that means they're slippery. You need grips that you can hold on to very lightly but won't slip out of your hand. Most golf stores will re-grip your entire set for $75 or less.

Golf lessons are not therapy, so don't feel ashamed to take a couple. Almost every golfer you see on TV takes lessons. Remind someone that Mother's Day and Father's Day are coming, and a golf lesson would be a nice present.

What do I look for in a good golf teacher? Someone I can relate to as a person. Someone who communicates ideas mostly with easy to understand images and pictures, rather than using technical mumbo jumbo such as swing plane. I'm not a big fan of video swing analysis, unless you're a single-digit handicap. I'd prefer a teacher who spends his time physically holding your head, your ankles or your hands. Golf has to be learned from feeling and doing, not by watching a complex geometry lesson on a laptop.

Finally, a word about practice. Make it fun. Practise pitching balls into a basket from a few yards away. Using 10 balls, give yourself five points for getting the ball in the basket, three for hitting the rim and one for just hitting it. Keep trying to beat your score. And you can do this in your backyard. You'll be amazed how great you'll be with your touch around the greens in no time.

Swing your club a few minutes each day at home with one hand so it almost swings by itself, and note how you can feel the club head. Now swing with both hands until it feels as light as it did with one hand. Hit balls at the range with this feeling in mind. You should notice a much better result. When you go to the range, always try to hit a target, whether you're using a driver or a pitching wedge. You'll be amazed how much the brain will get the ball to the target even when your technique isn't so hot. I know that if you follow these suggestions, 2006 will be your best year yet. Fore!

David Goodman lives in North York and teaches privately, gives clinics and is director of a junior summer golf camp.

Femininity demands attention

About two weeks ago I wasn't feeling so hot and so I did what I usually do and headed for the local salon.

My hairdresser knows this routine of mine; after all, I'm not one of those spontaneous types. She knows better than anyone that change is simply not in my vocabulary.

Or so I thought.

After two years of having the exact same colour, cut and style, she gently asked me if I'd consider doing something "slightly" different.

"I trust you," I said, although a wave of nausea suddenly passed through me. So she'll cut two inches instead one. It will grow back, I thought to myself, trying to make myself relax.

A girl should always trust her instincts.

When I opened my eyes three hours later, my long caramel-coloured locks had turned into a shortened black mop. Instead of my golden-blond highlights, I had what looked like streaks of grey. I was a 20-something Cruella de Vil.

Now I'm not the kind of girl who has to have her nails done every week and I'm not the type of woman who won't step out of the house until she's dressed to the nines. But even girls like me have superficial standards.

Looking good and put together is such an essential part of being a woman. No matter how smart you are, or how well your career is going, a girl never feels quite complete until she looks just as polished on the outside.

I've often been accused of setting the woman's movement back 50 years with my views, but I know I'm right about this. Look at feminism pioneer Nellie McClung for heaven's sake. Even she wore pretty hats and blouses.

There's an unspeakable power that comes with looking feminine. Femininity demands attention, just as masculinity does. But it seems as if women have been made to feel embarrassed or shallow for taking so much pride in their looks.

When my friend Ana started working, she made a conscious effort never to look too pretty. Her fantastic clothes were replaced with conservative wear from Banana Republic. Her polished makeup was replaced with a neutral-coloured lipstick.

"Are you kidding? I can't stand out, I need to blend in," she told me when I asked her what the deal was.

When we first entered the workforce and tried to be taken seriously, the last thing we wanted was to be recognized by our youthful looks.

That doesn't mean we should be embarrassed by them.

It's been a couple of years now since I've graduated and started working full time and by now I'm confident enough in myself to bring out the woman in me.

In many ways, I wish I took more interest in the superficial stuff. I wish I cared for chipped nails more. I wish I'd wear something different than just clear mascara and clear lipgloss because maybe then my hairdresser would have taken me a bit more seriously too.

It wasn't the horrible hairstyle that made me bawl my eyes out the night I came home from the salon. It was what my hairdresser said. When I insisted she fix her "slight" mistake the next day, she told me I would have to wait a week.

"What's the big deal? You came to me with six months of roots showing so it's not like you really care," she said. "What's one more week going to do?"

I cried because she was right and it made me feel sick inside. At that point, not only did she ruin my hair, she insulted my womanhood, and that is something no girl should ever let go of.

Tomato Edamame Salad

1/2 lb. green beans, cut into thirds and ends trimmed off
2 c edamame (soy beans) shelled
(find these in the frozen vegetable section)
3 green onions, thinly sliced
1 pint cherry tomatoes, cut into halves
1 handful fresh basil, chopped
1 tblsp. rice vinegar
1 tblsp. fresh lime juice
1 tsp. honey
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
2 tsps. olive oil
dash of salt and freshly ground pepper to taste

Cook the green beans and edamame in boiling water until tender but crisp, approximately 5 min. Drain and set aside to cool

Combine green onions, tomatoes, basil, and cooked edamame and beans, tossing to mix

In a small bowl, prepare dressing. Combine vinegar, lime juice, honey, and mustard, whisking in the olive oil. Pour dressing over vegetables and toss to coat. This unusual combination of beans may be served chilled or at room temperature.

A Family Business for over 80 Years

About Life

Dear Ella,

After a few years of dating since my divorce, I met Sonia, whose company I really enjoy.

We have been seeing each other for a few weeks and have found that we share the same family values, are very involved in our children's lives and enjoy having fun, both alone and with our kids.

But I'm not jumping into this relationship with both feet, because I'm afraid of the financial commitment that may be expected of me down the road. I work very hard and am still raising my own family. I now have extra financial obligations due to the divorce and the thought of having to support children who are not my own is far from appealing to me.

I don't know if it's appropriate to raise the subject now and get it out of the way, or not. Sonia hasn't made any financial demands on me so far, but I know it's just around the corner.

What's Mine is Mine

Dear What's Mine is Mine

It's nice that you have finally made a connection with someone who makes you happy, but I'm not clear on why you feel the financial burden of Sonia's children will fall on your shoulders. Sonia has managed to raise her children without your help until now. I'm sure she has some kind of income, and chances are she also receives child support from her ex-husband.

Right now you are simply in the "getting to know you" phase of your relationship. Putting up road blocks is not a great way to start. First, you need to see if there is anything for you to build on.

Since you are both parents, you must be able to respect each other's choices when it comes to your children. First and foremost, you'll both do what's best for for the kids.

At this stage in your life, the chances of finding a soulmate with no history is slim. You have to grow and learn about each other together and decide what you can and can't accept from each other.

Don't put the cart in front of the horse. Relax and enjoy each other's company for now. If you are meant to be together, you will work the details out in time.

The Zareinu Moveathon

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

The Zareinu Educational Centre is a gem in the treasure chest we call Toronto Jewish education. Its motto is, appropriately: Making Miracles Happen.

Recently, I had a shmooze with Eve Gestetner, the director of special events who is responsible for overseeing the organization's annual major fundraiser – the Moveathon, which raises close to $1 million for the school's programs.

Eve, who is clearly passionate about her role at Zareinu, told me it is a Jewish school for children with physical and developmental disabilities or behavioural problems. The school is located in the Sephardic Kehilla Centre and has 73 in-house students, provides specialized input to other schools and has a teacher ration of 2:1.

Zareinu is an outstanding school for students six months to 21 years old, utilizing innovative programs such as one to help children with autism, based on a U.S. model. The school also provides speech, occupational and music therapy, an exceptional walking program called MEDEK and hydrotherapy (swim).

The beauty of Zareinu is that it frequently accepts and works with children who have not been helped by other institutions. Children receive special education in Hebrew and English.

Eve told me that Zareinu reaches out to other schools and stressed the importance of accepting all children, as well as consulting with parents on how best to address their children's needs.

Zareinu's Moveathon is in its ninth year and takes place on June 18, Father's Day, starting at Earl Bales Park at 9 a.m. Registration began in early April. Last year, 6,000 people participated in various events in the park including a 100-, 50- and 20-kilometre ride; a 10-kilometre run and a two-kilometre walk. Sponsors include Yogen Früz, Steelman, The Shoe Company, RH Capital Partners, Barrday, and Macfarlane Nameplate & Anodizing Inc.

The Moveathon's success is evident as other private schools have become involved. Students at Leo Baeck, a fundraising leader, have raised more than $4,000 that will be used to buy educational equipment.

Rabbis from many shuls attend informational meetings to learn about the school and the Moveathon. Some of the participating synagogues include the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto, Holy Blossom Temple, Beit Haminyan, The Lodzer Shul, Adath Israel Congregation, Beth David, Darchei Noam, Temple Kol Ami, Petach Tikva and Shaarei Shomayim.

The Moveathon gets a great deal of attention from the small fundraising staff, which also works hard on the school's golf tournament, a bowling evening, an evening of fashion and song, and the Zareinu Dollars programs.

Eve is overwhelmed by the goodness of the individuals who have committed their professional and volunteer time to the Moveathon. "It is so heartwarming to me to see how thousands of people give of themselves in order to make the world a better place," she said.

Zareinu had humble beginnings. The school was founded by three men motivated entirely by goodness, who saw the glaring need for a school like Zareinu.

The school's success stories include one child who was diagnosed with complex neurological disorders and therefore perceived to have a limited capacity to succeed. The parents were advised to institutionalize their little one. Today, the child speaks, is lovable and interacts well with others.

Another child, who was unresponsive in most ways, loved the sound of the guitar. Zareinu staff saw this as an open door to therapy and incorporated guitar notes and chords into a computer program, which increased the child's communication dramatically.

It costs nearly $40,000 a year for a child to attend Zareinu full time. However, Zareinu's annual Moveathon gives more families the opportunity to take advantage of the school's resources. Clearly, this community-wide accessibility is only possible because of the Moveathon, a most impressive event and undertaking.

Olmert lays political groundwork for his final borders plan

By HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Interim Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert indicated clearly in Sunday's cabinet meeting that he will be quick to draw Israel's border in the West Bank and that he was serious when he said he would not wait forever for the Palestinians.

Olmert said before the election that his "convergence plan" – to withdraw from most of the West Bank and establish permanent borders – would be implemented if, after a "reasonable period of time" it became clear that there is no partner on the Palestinian side. On Sunday, he said it was already clear that there is no Palestinian partner.

After Hamas justified last week's suicide attack in Tel Aviv, Olmert said, it's important "that the diplomatic community, foreign ministries and government ministries around the world absorb the fact that there is no partner here with whom it is possible to talk."

Ehud Olmert
[Israel Sun photo]

There were strong condemnations of Hamas' reactions to the attack from around the world, he said, both from governments and in the international media. He pointed to editorials in the New York Times, the Washington Post and Britain's Guardian (which he called "as left as can be") "praising the Israeli position and essentially [saying] it has been proven that Israel does not have a partner and that this will necessarily lead to unilateral Israeli steps."

In an interview with the Jerusalem Post before the election, Olmert, in explaining his plan to withdraw from most of the West Bank while keeping a few settlement blocs, said Israel would wait to see if a Hamas-led Palestinian Authority (PA) government would accept the international community's three conditions for recognition of its legitimacy: recognizing Israel, renouncing terror and accepting previous agreements.

"We will wait, but I don't intend to wait forever," he said at the time.

"If, after a reasonable time passes, it becomes clear that the PA is not willing to accept these principles, we will need to begin to act."

His words in Sunday's cabinet meeting, as well as the messages he has given potential coalition partners over the last few weeks, indicate that in his mind, a reasonable time has already passed.

Senior diplomatic officials said Olmert's telescoping the time frame for his plan is connected with the U.S. election timetable and a desire to get his withdrawal plan off the ground while U.S. President George W. Bush, whose term expires in January 2009, is still in office.

One official said Olmert is in a hurry to go to Washington and get Bush to repeat the same commitments supporting Israel's plans that

Shul Launches Website

PETERBOROUGH, Ont. — Beth Israel Synagogue, the only shul in Peterborough, Ont., launched a website this month. The site, www. bethisraelsynagogue.ca, serves the shul's 35 families and the small city's 300 Jews. It includes a history of the local Jewish community, a list of events, and community news. The website "will allow synagogue members to keep up on community events and activities, and will provide a welcome, easily accessible portal… for unaffiliated Jews in the area, and to those considering moving to the area," said shul president Larry Gillman.

PM Backs Museum

WINNIPEG — Prime Minister Stephen Harper will honour a $100-million pledge made by the previous Liberal government to a planned human rights museum in Winnipeg, the project's supporters say. Gail Asper, daughter of the project's founder, media mogul Israel Asper, said she and her brother David met recently in Ottawa with Harper, who said he would honour the pledge and would help find ways to fund the museum's $20 million in operating costs, Canadian Press reported. The $270-million museum is slated to open in 2010. The Asper Foundation has pledged up to $50 million to it, while the province and city have agreed to contribute $20 million apiece.

Lawyers Mark Shoah

TORONTO — The Law Society of Upper Canada is holding its second annual Holocaust Memorial Day program this week. In addition to an evening reception on April 26 featuring Ruth Fazal, composer of Oratorio Terezin, the Law Society was to host a panel about hate on the Internet and freedom of expression.

New Muslim Paper

TORONTO — The Calgary-based Islamic Supreme Council of Canada (ISCC) launched the Muslim Free Press in Toronto last week. The newspaper, to be distributed every other week in Toronto, Montreal, Calgary and Vancouver, was launched in the wake of the uproar over Danish cartoons of the Muslim prophet Muhammad, which were reprinted in the Western Standard and Jewish Free Press in Calgary. The paper has news and opinion in English and French, the ISCC said.

World

Prominent Rabbi Dies

ENGLEWOOD, N.J. — Rabbi Arthur Hertzberg, a leading and provocative liberal U.S. rabbi, died April 17 at 84 in Englewood, N.J. An outspoken writer and speaker, Rabbi Hertzberg was a staunch supporter of the civil rights movement. He called for the creation of a Palestinian state after the 1967 Six Day War and once called the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington the "national cathedral of American Jewry's Jewishness," the New York Times reported. A longtime Conservative pulpit rabbi, he was also president of the American Jewish Congress from 1972 to 1978 and the editor of The Zionist Idea, a primer on Zionism. Born in Poland, he came to the United States with his family at age five.

Shul Hit on Pesach

KIEV — Several windows were shattered in a Ukrainian synagogue in what is believed to be an anti-Semitic attack. Vandals threw stones early on April 17 at the Choral Synagogue in downtown Kirovograd. No one was hurt. Police are investigating, but no arrests have been reported. According to local Jewish leaders, the incident was only the most recent act of vandalism against Jewish institutions in the central Ukrainian city during the past few years. Local Jews believe the attack was an anti-Semitic act, as it happened on Passover.

Israeli Invention Quiets Canadian Fans

MONTREAL — A Drummondville, Que., manufacturer and an Israeli high-tech firm have signed a deal to develop less noisy ventilation systems.

Venmar Ventilation Inc., which has been making products for North American homes for more than 25 years, hopes to integrate the new noise-control technology invented by Rehovot-based Silentium into all its products, ranging from stove hoods to attic heat-exchangers. More than one million homes have at least one Venmar product, the company says.

Silentium's "S-chip" analyzes noises and sends out wavelengths of the opposite phase to them, thereby dampening the sound. Silentium recently also reached a deal with General Motors for the right to install the S-chip in its cars.

The S-chip does not eliminate all sound, but reduces the more annoying noises, its creators say. Ventilation systems have been especially challenging because both the mechanical parts of the fan and the air running through ducts make noise, and unlike other machinery, they can't be insulated.

The partnership was made possible by the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation. Established in 1994 and funded by Canada and Israel, it brings together firms seeking partners for research and development.

School Founder Dies

GREENSBORO, N.C. — Maurice "Chico" Sabbah, founder of America's only non-Orthodox Jewish boarding school, died April 17 at 77. A wealthy businessman, Sabbah gave more than $100 million (US) to American Hebrew Academy's (AHA) 100-acre campus in Greensboro, N.C. It opened in 2001. Sabbah's gift, which paid full tuition for the school's first 77 students, is believed to be the single largest donation by any person to Jewish education in the United States. Born in Brooklyn and raised in Great Neck, N.Y., Sabbah made aliyah and served in the Israeli army after college. After returning to the United States, he served in the U.S. Army in Korea before entering the reinsurance business.

Germany OKs Access

WASHINGTON — Germany has agreed to drop its resistance to opening one of the world's largest Shoah archives, Brigitte Zypries, the German justice minister, said last week at Washington's U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum, which led calls to open up to 50 million documents at Bad Arolsen, Germany. Of 11 nations on a commission controlling the archives, only Germany and Italy had resisted access, citing privacy concerns for innocents who might be mentioned in the documents. Germany will back access when the commission meets next month.

Reading of Megillat Hashoah draws hundreds

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Liturgical text read by more than 100 Jewish communities around the world

In what is becoming an annual tradition, hundreds of people gathered to read Megillat Hashoah at Adath Israel Congregation Sunday to honour the Jewish victims of the Holocaust.

The service began with an introduction from Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Rabbi Philip Scheim, who with the help of Alex Eisen, inspired the liturgical text that is now read by more than 100 Jewish communities around the world, Rabbi Scheim said.

Last year, the service was held at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation to commemorate the 60th anniversary of liberation.

The reading of each of the six chapters of the megillah was followed by a candlelighting ceremony during which a candle was lit to honour both the victims and the heroes of the Holocaust.

Seven candles were lit by members of the Jewish community in honour of the six million Jewish victims, the destroyed communities, the 1.5 million Jewish children, the ghetto fighters, the righteous of the nations, the partisans and the fallen soldiers and victims of terror in the State of Israel.

Throughout the evening, the Renanim Vocal Youth Ensemble, performed under the direction of Susan Michaels, accompanied by Konrad Harley.

The first chapter of the Megillat Hashoah, written by a Holocaust victim, portrayed the strength of the Jewish people in overcoming each adversity that threatened the very existence of Jews. The reading was followed by Cantor Tibor Kovari singing Ani Ma'amin.

The second chapter, read by Sheryl Saperia, told a story of a young journalist who saw first-hand the horrors of life in a Jewish ghetto.

"Wherever you looked, terrifying sights – a dead body, its face covered by a newspaper, and a man hastily removing its overcoat while digging in its pockets with anticipation; a young girl, holding tightly her infant sister who was weeping out of hunger listlessly… a boy who had tried to smuggle potato skins into the ghetto surrounded by a group of guards revelling with coarse laughter as they stripped him before he was beaten to death."

Cantor Moshe Ginz sang Es Brent before Rabbi Erwin Schild took the stage to read the third chapter of the megillah in Hebrew. It was a passage that was found wedged between two wooden beds, written on a scrap of paper by a woman named Gertrude.

She cursed herself and all the other Jews in her town who were blind to their fate and didn't escape to the far east before being sent to death camps.

"O, how foolish and blind we were! We rejected the advice to abandon the homeland; to emigrate to the distant east and we hid ourselves from the signs, 'No Jews Allowed.' Our ears were sealed from hearing the hateful speeches, for they were just words…"

Michael Furman read the fourth chapter about a prisoner who claimed to have been reborn four times and died once, having narrowly averted death on four separate occasions and experienced a death after being forced to extract the gold teeth from the mouth of his brother who was gassed to death.

Cantor Marshall Loomer chanted the fifth chapter titled, "A heavenly voice, hovering, cries out," while the congregation responding with the phrase, "For those, I do weep," after each passage.

"Let there be light again," the final chapter, read by Ellie Weisdorf, chronicled the difficulty survivors had when it came time to return to their homes and the lives they knew before the war.

"The unfortunate who tried to return to their homes found in them hostile neighbours from time to time…"

But while the writer warned that survivors and their families should never forget the horror they experienced, survivors should also not forget to live their lives.

"Do not mourn too much, but do not sink into the forgetfulness of apathy. Do not allow days of darkness to return; weep, but wipe the tears away."

What it means for us all

From the editor's desk

We had no right to expect that Canadian soldiers would be unharmed in Afghanistan. But it was our hope, if not our folly.

Cpl. Matthew Dinning of Petawawa, Ont., Bombardier Myles Mansell of Victoria, Cpl. Randy Payne of Wainwright, Alta., and Lieut. William Turner of Edmonton were killed on the weekend in a roadside blast that ripped through the jeep in which they were travelling.

Of course, more than their lives ended in the explosion. So, too, did the wholeness of their respective families, complete, intimate circles of human connection, love and belonging never more.

In all, 15 Canadian soldiers and one diplomat have been killed in Aghanistan on the mission that our government and many other governments of the free world have deemed to be of paramount importance: helping to implant and secure the rooting of freedom in the mostly dry, dusty soil of Afghanistan.

Freedom in Afghanistan, it is hoped, will be part of a solidly entrenched bulwark of democracy ultimately connecting all parts of the world like a shield of hard-as-rock, shining pearls.

In his message of condolence to the families and friends of the fallen soldiers, Prime Minister Stephen Harper encapsulated the essence of Canada's role in Afghanistan. "These men were working to bring security, democracy, self-sufficiency and prosperity to the Afghan people and to protect Canadians' national and collective security."

The prime minister's words were not mere platitudes. They are a reflection of a very large, though at times, disquieting truth.

Afghanis have asked Canada and many other countries for help in reclaiming their country from the intolerant, fanatic Taliban and in restoring a brown "barren" landscape into one that might sustain a green and golden life free from oppression.

The deaths of the Canadians will undoubtedly renew the call in some quarters to bring our troops home. But that call must be resisted despite the irremediably sorrowful loss of life.

Harper was absolutely correct in pointing out the linkage in the two prongs of the Canadian mission in Afghanistan: assisting the Afghanis is in the best interests of Canadians. Enhancing the structure of democracy in Afghanistan, even a modest one, enhances security in Canada and the West. This is not, it must be emphasized, an American need. Rather, it is an imperative of the West.

We were reminded of the inescapability and the importance of the linkage on the weekend by none other than Osama bin Laden. He apparently crawled out of his hiding place long enough to record a new audiotape that was dutifully broadcast Sunday by Al Jazeera. The last time he "spoke" to the world was some three months ago.

As in the past, he declared that the West was at war with Islam. Of course his accusations bear no resemblance to the truth but are, in fact, a projection of his own malevolently religious worldview of events.

To prove the truth of his declaration, he brought two proofs: the decision by some western nations to deny funding to the Hamas-run Palestinian Authority, and the call at the United Nations to send soldiers to Darfur to end the genocide there.

"The blockade which the West is imposing on the government of Hamas proves that there is a Zionist crusader war on Islam," bin Laden – assuming it was him – said on the tape.

Bin Laden, we know, hates Israel for two reasons. It is Jewish and sovereign in a part of the world he considers the exclusive domain of his kind of Muslims. And it is the vanguard of the West with all the attendant values of the western way of life, namely democracy and freedom of choice.

He is attempting to penetrate the West Bank and Gaza. Intelligence officials have long ago noted his efforts. The recent withholding of funds to the PA is simply another of his many mendacious pretexts.

The high-tech, cave-dwelling bin Laden also urged his followers to pour into Sudan to fight the UN peacekeepers who are scheduled to take over peacekeeping duties from the feeble African Union forces at the end of September.

"I call on mujahedeen and their supporters, especially in Sudan and the Arab peninsula, to prepare for long war again the crusader plunderers in western Sudan. Our goal is… to defend Islam, its land and its people," bin Laden said.

Thus, we send our deepest, most heartfelt condolences to the families and friends of Dinning, Mansell, Payne and Turner. Our words can never abate the sense of loss they feel. But it is important that they know these brave soldiers losing their lives in Afghanistan is the irreducible essence of what we are as a people and what we cherish so dearly for our children: the belief that every human being is precious and entitled to live his or her life with the freedom to make the belief real.

Project Equity, a grassroots organization run by three high school students and one university student, is organizing a "Scream for Darfur" rally this Sunday, April 30, at 1 p.m., at Queen's Park.

Speakers will include MP David Kilgour, Darfur activists Normal Epstein and Acol Dor of Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan (CASTS), and MP Olivia Chow.

It is especially important for Jews to attend, organizer Leora Smith told The CJN. The Grade 12 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Richmond Hill branch is a leader of Project Equity (www.projectequity.org) along with David Berkal of William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute, Ben Singer of CHAT's Tanenbaum campus and Assaf Weisz of York University.

"Whenever we learn about the Holocaust, we spend hours talking about, 'Didn't anybody know?' and 'Why didn't anybody do anything?' and now we do know [about Darfur, where violence, malnutrition and disease have killed 400,000 people]," Smith said. "It's ridiculously hypocritical if we stand by and don't do anything."

Project Equity has also organized an information assembly that is travelling to schools in the Toronto area over the next few weeks.

Jewish motorcycle club heads to Tennessee

Yidden on Wheels to honour staff and students who collected paper clips to build children's Holocaust memorial

The Yidden on Wheels Motorcycle Touring Company will be hitting the road once again to commemorate the Holocaust as part of the "Paper Clip Ride to Remember 2006" next week.

About 350 Jewish Motorcyclists Alliance (JMA) members from Canada, the United States and Australia will ride to the Whitwell Middle School in Whitwell, Tenn. on May 5 to honour the staff and students who collected millions of paper clips to build a children's Holocaust memorial at the school.

Last year, the JMA, an association of 10 Jewish motorcycle clubs across North America and Australia, went to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C. to commemorate Yom Hashoah, but Steven Stein, the president of Toronto-based YOW said that although the JMA wanted to go back to Washington and do the same thing they did last year, Stein didn't want Ride to Remember to have a "been there, done that" feel to it.

"I wanted to maintain the novelty of the ride," Stein said.

He said he first heard of the Paper Clip Project – a campaign initiated in 1998 by the staff and students of the Whitwell Middle School to collect a paper clip for each of the six million Holocaust victims – on last year's Ride to Remember.

"Some members told us about the Paper Clip Project," Stein said, adding that a documentary was filmed in 2004 about the project. "Most of us hadn't heard of it. So we wanted to honour what they had done."

He said he and Sid Rochwerg, co-chairs of the "Paper Clip Ride To Remember 2006," organized the event to honour the staff and students in the small town that doesn't even have a Jewish community.

He said that the first night, on May 4, the Toronto contingent of almost 70 bikers will stay in Chattanooga, Tenn. which is about 30 miles away from Whitwell, because the rural town of about 1,600 can't accommodate so many people.

The next morning, the bikers will converge at the Jewish Community Federation of Greater Chattanooga. After a departure ceremony and a breakfast sponsored by the federation, they will begin the ride to Whitwell, where members of the community, staff and students of the school will be awaiting their arrival.

"We'll meet the kids and staff and we plan on having a ceremony. They're setting aside the day for us," he said adding that the JMA will provide a barbecue at the school and will screen the documentary called Paper Clips.

"We didn't want to come and talk about the Holocaust, we wanted to come and honour them because we knew that they had many survivors come to the school to talk about their experiences. With the rise in anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial, we wanted to honour them," Stein said.

Although last year's ride wasn't a fundraising event, Stein said that this year, they wanted to do something special for the Whitwell Middle School.

He said he got in touch with the principal of the school, Linda Hooper, and said, "We know how to fundraise. What can we do for you?"

He said she asked for Promethean boards, which are electronic teaching aids, priced at $4,000 each.

Stein promised he would raise enough money to buy one for the school.

By November of last year, they raised enough money to buy three, and as of this month, raised enough to buy two more.

After the official presentation ceremony at the school on May 5, the bikers will ride back to Chattanooga for a Shabbat banquet at the Chattanooga Clarion.

The trip will conclude with Saturday morning services on May 6 conducted by the the "official" JMA Rabbi Zachery Betesh, or Rabbi Zigzag, as he is affectionately called, from the Florida-based King David Biker gang.

"We hope to let the world know that we remember the victims that perished in the Holocaust and to honour these wonderful people. We also hope to dispel stereotypes [of small-town people] and foster a sense of awareness among members of Jewish communities about what we're doing."

Nava Siboni holds a photo of her daughter Liron, 19, who was a terror victim.

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Local photographer Jason Schwartz is attempting to put a human face behind every Israeli terror victim.

With the help of One Family Fund, a non-profit organization that helps terror victims and their families, Schwartz, 35, met and photographed about 150 victims or their family members over a recent three-week period in Israel.

The result is a photo exhibit of about 25 images and text, on display from May 1 to 31 at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, as part of Contact, Toronto's annual photography festival.

Several of the subjects who have been helped by One Family Fund will be on hand to share their stories at a community event sponsored by the organization on May 15.

Schwartz, who in 1997 published a book of portraits titled The Ghosts That Haunt Us – Portraits of Holocaust Survivors, and completed a commission on behalf of the Florida Holocaust Museum in 2001, photographing 115 Holocaust survivors in southwest Florida, says he started his current project because he was "frustrated and angry that the media was not telling the story of Israel victims of terror.

"I have family there who go to work, ride buses and eat in restaurants. I wanted to tell their story and let people know that anyone is a target."

His photos included everyone, he says, "Jews, Bedouins, Muslims, Christians."

By creating a photo document, he says, he is letting people identify with what it means to live in Israel. "Through these pictures, we are giving a voice to the departed. We are also bringing a human story to every statistic."

Every photograph has a handwritten message along with it, says Schwartz, "so people can 'meet' the subject. The 150 pictures I took only scratch the surface. I could have worked for three years."

Pam Albert, Canadian executive director of One Family Fund, says her organization got involved in the project because they wanted to create a memory of the intifidah.

"We wanted a concrete way to look at [both the sorrow and the life in Israel]. We wanted people to see how Israelis are dealing with tragedy and also moving forward. They have a strong conviction to move on."

Meeting with his subjects – he was accompanied by a One Family caseworker – Schwartz had to be more than a photographer, says Albert.

"He needed to be compassionate and sensitive. These people wanted to tell their story – he couldn't just take their picture and leave. [In some cases] they showed him where the attack occurred and how it happened.

"It was a very intense time for him. It was emotionally and physically draining. He got so much out of it, but he also had to find a way to separate from them and leave his feelings behind."

She says that there has been a decline in our generation in terms of helping Israel. "Jason serves as a role model in terms of what we can do."

Tickets for the May 15 event are $18 including a kosher dessert reception. For information, call 416-644-4955, ext. 2051, or e-mail linda@onefamilyfund.org.

To remember, honour and act

It is a melancholy moment. We light the memorial candle on Yom Hashoah v'Hagvurah, focus our thoughts and try to imagine the unimaginable. For most of us, born in the second half of the last century, it is a nearly impossible imagining. Our minds resist. Our eyes tear. And our hearts break. As former justice minister Irwin Cotler once noted, the events of the Shoah are too terrible to imagine, but not too terrible to have happened.

For some of our parents and grandparents, alas, the imagination is not the faculty they need to summon. They were there. They remember. They remember constantly. Every day. Until the end of their days. A sound, a colour, an expression, a photo, a fragrance, the quiet of the night, the noise of the day, the laughter of a friend, the sobbing of a child – anything and everything evokes memories.

That they survived may have owed as much to their luck as to their character. However, that they rebuilt their lives – and in the process, contributed to and helped to rebuild the various societies of the post-World War II, post-Shoah world in which they settled – owes only and exclusively to the determination, strength and goodness of their character.

They affirmed every day, in the forward-moving ordinariness of their lives, a hallowed enactment of the psalmist's exhortation, "We shall not die, but live." That remarkably courageous affirmation has been our inheritance.

But can it be said that we are, truly, in a post-Shoah world?

Can we point to a world free of ethnic hatred?

The leader of the government of Iran refers to the Shoah as a "myth" and assiduously, obsessively applies the resources of his people to achieving "a world without Zionism," to "wiping the Jewish state off the map."

Can we point to a world free of genocide?

Some 400,000 people are believed to have been killed in the Darfur region of Sudan since 2003. As many as 6,000 people die or are killed there each month. The sadistic murder and marauding by Janjaweed militias have displaced more than two million people from their homes.

We will indeed remember the victims of the Holocaust. We will honour the survivors. But remembrance and honour alone in a world terrorized by fundamentalist harbourers of hate and radical, state-sanctioned champions of violence – are frail, ineffective bearers of the precious, life-affirming inheritance that it is our sacred duty to protect and pass on.

We must act

It falls to us, too – more than 60 years after the gates of the Nazis' concentration camps were thrown open – as it will fall to our children and to their children after them, to live, rather than simply say, the phrase, "Never again."

25 years ago in The CJN

• Canadian Council of Christians and Jews president Victor Goldbloom and fundraising chairman George Cohon said they were taking steps to reverse the organization's shaky finances by reducing staff and activities, and by corporate fundraising

• A new Israeli organization was started by children of Holocaust survivors with the motto, "To remember and never to forget." Its aim was to honour survivors who established new lives and families, and to make sure that the world remembers the Shoah.

A latter-day Haggadah

The front-page editorial "The Haggadah inspires hope for a better life" (CJN, April 12) is accompanied by a photograph of a gentleman in a suit and tie standing next to an elderly lady, to illustrate the meaning of a "better life." One of the lady's hands is outstretched, as if she is counting, and in the other hand she is holding a food basket. Behind the suited gent looms large a poster that identifies in Hebrew letters the recipient of the food basket: "Food baskets for Holocaust survivors."

And once more survivors are lining up, this time not for soup but for food given in the spirit of Pesach charity. According to recent statistics, 35 per cent of survivors live below the poverty line, while enormous sums of money from Germany have been pouring into the coffers of the Israeli government and into the vault banks of the Claims Conference

This photograph is a pictorial emblem of what has been done to the survivors of the Holocaust – a latter-day Haggadah.

Many Jews lost to intermarriage

Jews, in prewar years, in Germany and Austria, toyed for more than a century with the theory that reform – the distancing ourselves from traditional Judaism, as manifested by intermarriage – is the panacea to maintain a strong Jewish existence ("Jewish regeneration depends on intermarriage: prof," CJN, April 12). Unfortunately, we are cognizant today that it was a total failure and caused many thousands to be lost permanently to Judaism.

Intermarriage to resuscitate 'sickly Jew'?

I was shocked to read the coverage of Sander Gilman's recent talk ("Jewish regeneration depends on intermarriage. prof," CJN, April 12) for two reasons. First, I was surprised that you printed the "sh-word" he used for a non-Jewish woman, which in my vocabulary is as derogatory as using a certain "n-word" for blacks. Secondly, I fail to understand his thesis that intermarriage is what will resuscitate the sickly Jew. It would be comparable to me trying to save the life of one of my chronically ill patients through euthanasia!

Jewish events promote materialism

Recently my children came home from their Toronto day school with the forms for a UJA Walkathon. I, too, participated as a child and have fond memories. However, I am tempted to discourage them from participating on the walk, and here's why.

In the last few years, participants are being motivated with the promise of various toys. That's right. God forbid, we should teach our children to perform a selfless act of raising money for a worthwhile cause without personal gain. No. Instead the Jewish establishment wants to turn a low-key, honourable event into a materialistic feeding frenzy. Instead of children concentrating on the needy within the Jewish community, they are entirely focused on getting enough donations so they can get some piece of junk to throw on their already too-high pile of toys at home. This goes completely against my (and I hope they are Jewish) values!

When Feed the Children or War Child Canada solicit for funds, they don't do so with the promise of a Playstation or a Blackberry or a fitness-club membership. The cause stands on its own, as should the UJA's. Why is it we have to turn all these Jewish events (yes, bar mitzvahs, etc.) into orgies of conspicuous consumption. Why are we afraid to be serious with our children? Is this what the rabbis had in mind when they discussed modes of tzedakah?

Writer not credited

The book Solomon and the Ant and Other Jewish Folktales was written by Sheldon Oberman, a very talented Jewish storyteller from Winnipeg ("Fun stories that make you think," CJN, April 6). Unfortunately, he did not have the opportunity to complete the book due to his death. That task was left to Peninnah Schram, a world-renowned Jewish storyteller. She should have been acknowledged, so that she can get the credit she so richly deserves.

Iran's nuclear program

We are postponing the inevitable if Iran is permitted to continue with its uranium-enrichment program. Russia and China are appeasing Iran for economic reasons. Once Iran becomes a nuclear power, not only the Middle East, but also the entire world will be threatened. Iran's nuclear program is a step toward Armageddon, the end of society as we know it today. Iran must be stopped before it is too late. This is one time when the United Nations must show a strong front and put a stop to this madness.

The March of the Living: healing wounded memories

By ELI RUBENSTEIN

It was a breathtaking winter day – we were standing in the middle of a pristine body of water, on the thick, solid ice of Maple Lake near Parry Sound, Ont., breathing in the fresh, bracing winter air and the extraordinary scenery. We were all entranced by the exquisitely blue sky, the snow-tipped trees glistening in the midday sun and the endless carpet of untouched snow that covered the lake.

Our small group was made up of about 15 students, a few staff members, and two Holocaust survivors: Bill Glied and Nate Leipciger. We were part of a larger group of more than 200 students and chaperones who had gathered in Camp George for a weekend Shabbaton in preparation for our two-week journey to Poland and Israel on the March of the Living.

Suddenly, one of the survivors, Bill, came up from behind Nate and pulled him close, so that they stood almost like one unit on the frozen lake. Then Bill laughed and said: "OK, now it's your turn – you stand in front of me… Do you remember?" Nate laughed and said, "Of course, I remember."

Both of them then turned to me and patiently explained the "inside joke." Nate and Bill had been prisoners in Auschwitz-Birkenau, and although they never met there, they shared similar experiences. They used to stand at the Appelplatz for hours, at times for an entire day or night, in the bitter cold, without proper clothing, at the whim of their Nazi overseers. The wind was sometimes so terrible that they would take turns standing in front of each other to give some relief from the freezing wind.

Sixty years later, facing a frozen Ontario lake, both Nate and Bill were reminded of their experiences in Auschwitz-Birkenau. They were able to laugh about the memory, and even contrast it with the glorious setting and the friendly company they were in. But it is not always that easy for the survivors.

Sometimes the mental images of events are so searing, so indelible and so haunting that one wonders if those who have experienced these traumas will ever be able to cope with the terrible sights they witnessed and experienced.

On a recent trip to Montreal, I had occasion to hear survivors of the Holocaust, the Cambodian genocide and the Rwandan genocide speak about their experiences.

Holocaust survivor Faiga Burman Wajcer was speaking to a small group of Montreal March of the Living students. One of her many anecdotes concerned a cattle car from Hungary whose arrival she happened to see at Auschwitz-Birkenau on a summer day. The doors clattered open, revealing inside an entire wedding party peering out to the smoke-filtered sunlight. The bride was in her white wedding gown, the groom in his finest chassidic clothing, the rebbe in his streimel and white stockings, all the guests wearing their best wedding finery. As the Auschwitz orchestra played, the shocked and terrified wedding party was marched directly into the gas chambers.

The following day in Montreal, at a conference marking the anniversary of the Rwandan genocide, Youk Chhang, a survivor of the 1975-79 Khmer Rouge genocide in Cambodia, talked about his childhood experiences in the infamous killing fields of his native country. While still a young boy, he and his fellow Cambodian slave workers were called to attention as two blindfolded young people were brought out to face disciplinary action. The Khmer Rouge representative told the crowd the two had committed the unforgivable crime of "falling in love without permission."

"What should their penalty be?" he baited the crowd.

The crowd yelled: "Death. Death."

Before Youk Chhang's eyes, the two young lovers were beaten almost to the point of death – then buried while they were still apparently alive.

Esther Mujawayo, a survivor of the 1994 genocide in Rwanda, described her narrow escape from the hands of the Hutu murderers. Unfortunately, many members of her family, including her husband and her pregnant sister, were brutally butchered. Like many innocent victims, they were hacked to death. "It was considered a privilege to be shot," she quoted painfully. For years, the image that most haunted her was of her sister's body lying in a filthy latrine, never having been given a proper burial.

For many of the survivors, speaking about their experience is helpful. And we, the next generations, must listen well and lend an empathetic ear as they recount their life stories.

But sometimes, on rare occasions, we can do more than listen.

During that same weekend at Camp George, the four survivors present – Canadian March of the Living chair Anita Ekstein, Amek Adler, Bill Glied and Nate Leipciger – shared their moving memories with the students.

Anita began the weekend by describing how her father smuggled her (she was then eight years old) out of the ghetto to live as a Christian with a Polish family. "His last words were: 'Always remember who you are,'" Anita recalled. "And in truth I never forgot who I was – I was a Jew."

Perhaps the most poignant moment – among many – came when Amek Adler rose to speak. During Shabbat services, when the students recited the Shema Yisrael, the words stirred the most painful of memories inside of Amek.

"I was about 14 years old and was a slave labourer in a concentration camp set up by the Nazis near Radom," Amek told the hushed gathering. "One day, the Nazis learned that a young man had escaped the camp. The Nazis rounded up the escaped man's remaining family, a mother and father, and two girls and one boy, ages seven to 14, and forced them onto their knees in front of the all the rest of the camp inmates who had been assembled to witness their punishment. The Nazi – he had a black patch over one of his eyes – then shouted to the prisoners, 'This is what we do to the family of someone who decides to escape.' And then he shot each family member in the head once, then back over them again to ensure they were all dead. As the parents and the children slumped over, each proclaimed the words of the Shema on their lips before they died.

"And since then, each time I hear the Shema," Amek told us, "that is the picture that comes to mind. That poor family, the parents and the children on their knees reciting the Shema as they were being executed – I can't get it out of my head."

We all listened in stunned silence, wondering what it must be like to carry that kind of burden, that constant memory, for an entire lifetime. But something even more remarkable was about to happen later on the weekend.

On Saturday evening, the lights were dimmed, a braided candle was lit, and all of the Marchers formed a circle in middle of the dining room to sing Havdalah in unison. Then Rabbi Glenn Black invited Amek into the centre of the circle and said to him and all present: "Amek, you shared with us a very personal and difficult memory. But with your permission, we are now going to try and heal that memory. We are all going to sing Shema Yisrael many times over, so the picture you will have in your mind from now on, whenever you hear the Shema, will be of Jewish children marching towards a brighter future."

Amek Adler, centre, and participants on the March of the Living

Then the entire group of teenagers and chaperones broke out into a spirited rendition of Shema Yisrael, singing it perhaps 20 or 30 times, before launching into a medley of other Jewish songs. Amek was joined by his nephew, Mark, his fellow survivors and their grandchildren, and the Marchers kept singing around them, as if their singing alone could carry the world into a better future.

A few weeks later, Amek addressed the group, briefly: "You know, it's working. I was in synagogue last week and I heard the Shema being recited, and for a moment, I saw the image of the family in Radom, but after only a few seconds, it was replaced by all of your smiling faces…"

A memory that once seemed inconsolable, had received redemption.

As you are reading these words, 500 Jewish teenagers from across Canada, together with a group of Holocaust survivors, will be travelling through Poland taking part in the 2006 March of the Living. After visiting Israel, they will return home with a renewed commitment to Israel, to preserving the memory of the Shoah, to raising their voice against injustice, such as the ongoing genocide in Darfur, and to healing the world for future generations.

We, the Canadian Jewish community, should feel proud that within our midst, there are young people who care so deeply about the world and about the past and future of the Jewish people.

And for all the Holocaust survivors reading this article, know there is a generation of committed, courageous and caring Jewish youth who will never forget what you lived through and will work to heal the world from a scar even as terrible as the Holocaust.

Nachamu, nachamu ami: Be comforted and be consoled my people! ((Isaiah 40:1)

Eli Rubenstein is national director of March of the Living Canada.

Opinions

When is enough, enough?

When is enough really enough? When are we satisfied with what we have?

We humans constantly seek more, and yet we know that our needs are no longer dictating our appetites and acquisitiveness. In order to diet and even eat properly, nutritionists tell us to listen to our stomachs. Stop when you are full. Leave some over in your plate. (As though any of us can dismiss that insistent voice: "Finish what's on your plate!") But we tend to overeat, over-prepare, over-accumulate. We are greedy and told to feel guilty about it. Greed is, after all, a basic vice. But no one has taught us how not to want more: more kids, more clothes, more houses, more vacation, more money. Is there a point at which enough is really enough?

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

On Passover, we sing the lovely and lively song Dayeinu, "It would have been enough for us." The song is fun, but its meaning confuses and even misleads. Can we honestly say enough? If this had happened, it would have been enough. If that had happened, it would have been enough. What nonsense. Clearly it was all necessary. We want, expect and need it all. Yet, by focusing on each individual item, rather than on the totality of the experience, the song elicits a sense of gratitude and appreciation. We really would not have wanted just one item – all were necessary – but let's give thanks, one by one.

It sounds nice, but I wonder about the practicality of it. It seems to go against our very nature.

And I don't think that's all bad. In other words, I think we need a dose of "more" please. All the great innovations and advances of our civilizations are associated with human acquisitiveness. Seeking more, and looking for new and additional ways to eat and live, promotes progress and development. Even at the more quotidian level, if we were so satisfied with our existence, what would motivate us to marry, have kids, build houses, work, create, etc. Appreciating life is a very special gift, but so is building and growing and producing. So the challenge is to find an appropriate way to combine our greed with gratitude and satisfaction.

On a personal level, I am happy with my portion. I have a great life by any standard. My husband and I have been married for 41 astonishing years. I love my job, even if it exhausts me. I have four wonderful kids who married great spouses. They have given birth to seven wonderful grandchildren.

I am happy, grateful and fulfilled, but I don't want it to stop. I want more. Enough is not yet enough.

Reflections on Yom Ha'atzmaut

Just as we finish putting away the dishes from the celebration of Pesach, our founding story of liberation, suddenly it is time to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut. It fittingly follows our first festival of national liberation, making Israel the latest stage in the fulfilment of a national dream.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

In looking through Haggadah commentaries dealing with the cup of Elijah, I came across notes I had made on the atmosphere around the seder table that varied depending on the situation in Israel. Those notes certainly apply just as aptly to the mood on Yom Ha'atzmaut through the years.

"Some years anger. Some years hope," I wrote. "Some years anxiety, some years sorrow, some years shame, some years ambivalence."

We know that the cup of Elijah is filled just before the recitation of the curses in the Shfoch section of the Haggadah: "Pour out your wrath upon the nations that know you not, for they have devoured Jacob." This year at the seder it was my turn to comment on this strangely compelling – and repellent passage.

How do these notes belong to the time of atzmaut (independence)?

Some years, anger. These were the years right after World War II, when it seemed the whole world was our enemy, and we were torn between weeping at the loss of six million, and joy at the rebirth of the Jewish state. More recently, there was anger at the deaths of so many in pointless suicide bombings.

Some years, hope. I wrote last time about our first year in Jerusalem, when, despite the losses in 1967, we were once again reunited with the Western Wall, and it seemed possible that we could make peace with the Palestinians. It was the same feeling after Oslo, when resources poured into the Palestinian areas, when Jews and Arabs were making if not love, then business, but not war.

Some years, anxiety. Those were the days before the '67 war, when it seemed possible Israel would be destroyed and the world did nothing. Also the terrible years of the Yom Kippur War, 1973-74, when again it seemed Israel was in that slough of despond.

Some years sorrow. Sorrow for the thousands of Israeli soldiers who died to protect Israel. Grief over the many more shattered by the wounds they received. Tears for grieving families of those thousands, and the families whose children, parents and elders died when bombs tore them apart. The War of Attrition. The intifadah, parts I and II. The fear that one would sit down to eat pizza and never rise again, when buying a cup of coffee could be fatal.

Some years, shame. The great shame at the assassination of former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin by one of our own. Shame for the death of Palestinian children. Shame for the war in Lebanon that led to massacre – not by Israel, but on her watch in that tortured country. The continuing economic, social and cultural gulf between Israeli Jews and Israeli Arabs. The shrill cries from a few for expulsion of those Israeli citizens.

I think this is a year of ambivalence mixed with anxiety and hope. So what do we pour into this Elijah's cup?

Into that cup we pour our hope for the new government. Hope that Hamas will yet see the light, stop torturing its own people, and build, rather than destroy. Anxiety over the failures of the past that will haunt the future. Hope that all of Israel's citizens will enjoy a more equitable share of her prosperity.

The worst outcome would be a cup of despair. Rabbi Nachman warned against despair. It leads to a numbing blanket of indifference, indifference to one's own fate, to the fates of others, and to withdrawal from the challenges of life. People sunk in depression feel this numbness.

Israel is heralded as the first sign of our coming redemption. In the seder service, Elijah has been transformed, from an avenger taunting the recalcitrant people of Israel who were seduced by the colourful rituals of Baal, into the prophet of that redemption. I do not want to exclude or modify the curse – the pain is still too new. But I also want to celebrate Israel's 58th with the joy and hope that Israel will behave with its own high ethical and moral principles.

A giving community

Tzedakah. This Hebrew term is most often translated as "charity." However, since the word shares a root with the Hebrew word for "justice," the word tzedakah has a deeper meaning than that of simple charity. Indeed, the concept of tzedakah is central to living a righteous Jewish life.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Tzedakah takes many forms. Maimonides outlined eight levels of giving tzedakah, distinctions that have become well-known to many people.

At Pesach, we traditionally welcome to our table the stranger who has no seder to attend. And there are a variety of ways that we can offer tzedakah to others in our community. It might entail the donation of money or non-monetary resources. Or it might involve the expenditure of time and talent.

In particular, it is this last gift, of time and talent, that most dramatically enriches the everyday lives of members of our community. Volunteers provide invaluable service, whether by assisting in classrooms or helping new Canadians settle in their new, often frightening environment. In many respects, although raising money is of great value, the gift of time and talent provides an immeasurable, tangible support to many parts of our community.

Volunteerism also serves to unite people within discrete communities, people who have common interests; and it promotes the notions of sharing, participation and fellowship.

Volunteering has become a way of life for some people. In Edmonton, there is a wide base of individuals who regularly volunteer for large events that bring colour and excitement to the whole city. Whether it is for one of the many festivals that define our city, such as the annual Fringe Theatre Festival, the multicultural Heritage Festival or colourful folk festivals; or the national and international sporting events, such as the World University Games, the Commonwealth Games or the recent Edmonton 2005 World Masters Games, people of our city take the time from their busy careers to contribute to the success of these endeavours.

This phenomenon may be described as volunteerism on a grand scale. But the commitment to grassroots advocacy is seen every day throughout the country on a smaller scale. We see this primarily with respect to the delivery of charitable services, including the day-to-day operation of food banks across the nation. We also see it in times of distress and in times of crisis, such as during last year's horrific tsunami in Asia. We also witness it in non-emergency scenarios in the many institutions that serve us daily – schools, synagogues and community organizations.

Volunteers keep many of Canada's Jewish community organizations running efficiently. For example, volunteers have worked diligently in Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith, the Canada Israel Committee, Jewish family service programs, seniors drop-in centres and other places. And even though many of these organizations advocate for causes related to the organized Jewish community, they have also gone further to advocate for causes that benefit society as a whole.

As I have written earlier, for example, in the 1980s, the national law and social action committee of Canadian Jewish Congress took positions in connection with employment equity, immigration quotas, gun control and capital punishment. It also played a major and historically significant role in the debate leading up to the formulation of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Clearly, the Jewish agenda is not a one-issue agenda, but rather one that looks further to benefit society as a whole.

Returning to the basic notion of volunteerism in general, we see a proliferation in Canada of public service advocacy groups, all of which work toward the improvement of the quality of life and the fabric of Canadians living throughout society.

To be sure, there are many reasons why people do not choose to volunteer in their communities. Perhaps it is because of the hectic pace of our everyday lives. Some might even ascribe it to apathy. But the rewards of volunteerism not only provide personal satisfaction, but also contribute to a qualitative difference in the fabric of Canadian life.

In defining some of the values that are truly Canadian in nature, volunteerism ranks as a hallmark of responsible citizenship.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Jerusalem

The wind-swept hill containing the tomb of the biblical prophet Samuel attracts a steady stream of pious Jewish visitors and offers unsurpassed vistas of Jerusalem, an astonishingly diverse city torn by political intrigue and ethnic strife.

Sheldon Kirshner in Israel

On a cool morning in the first week of March, the sky was crystal blue and the views were sharp and clear from Nebi Samuel, captured by Israel during the Six Day War and requisitioned by Gen. Edmund Allenby's conquering British army as a base during World War I.

Looking straight ahead, I saw the Jewish neighbourhoods of Ramot and French Hill, which were built on land claimed by Palestinians that Israel annexed as part of its master plan to enlarge Jerusalem's boundaries.

Further in the distance were Mount Scopus, an isolated Jewish outpost in Jordanian territory from 1948 to 1967; the Mount of Olives, a venerable Jewish cemetery partially desecrated by Arabs during that period, and Givat Ze'ev and Ma'aleh Adumim, massive settlement blocs that figure prominently in Israel's future calculations. The newly elected Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert, has declared that both Givat Ze'ev and Ma'aleh will eventually be absorbed into Israel.

In addition to these settlement blocs, Olmert wants to retain Ariel, which was established in 1978 and is approximately 40 kilometres from Tel Aviv, and Gush Etzion, which was destroyed by the Arab Legion during the War of Independence and rebuilt by the children of the original settlers.

Both Givat Ze'ev, population 11,000, and Ma'aleh Adumim, population 30,000, are remarkably close to Jerusalem, which has been repeatedly targeted by Palestinian suicide bombers since the outbreak of the second intifadah nearly six years ago.

In geographic terms, these are not remote settlements far from the public eye, but sedate bedroom suburbs minutes away by car from the centre of town that Israel intends to amalgamate into greater Jerusalem sooner or later.

Ma'aleh Adumim, which is only seven kilometres from Jerusalem and commands the heights between the Judean Desert and the Jordan Valley, is strategically one of Israel's most important settlements.

Founded on the seventh night of Chanukah in 1975 by 23 families, it is Israel's largest outpost in the West Bank, and has been continually expanding.

More than a decade ago, in an unmistakable signal of its importance, the then Israeli prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin, announced his intention to close the gap between Ma'aleh Adumim and Jerusalem with 3,500 new homes.

But when the United States, Israel's chief ally, complained that its unilateralism was an obstacle to peace and an impediment to the territorial contiguity of a future Palestinian state, Israel quietly shelved the scheme.

Ariel Sharon, the former prime minister, revived the plan, spending tens of millions of dollars in 2003 to pave a road from Ma'aleh Adumim to Jerusalem.

Last November, following a statement by U.S. President George W. Bush suggesting that he accepted Israel's facts on the ground in the territories, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said that Ma'aleh Adumim would be connected to Jerusalem under the E-1 plan.

More recently, the Israeli media reported that construction had begun on a police headquarters in the E-1 zone.

The Palestinians, of course, have railed against the E-1 proposal, just as they were vehemently opposed to the Har Homa housing project in eastern Jerusalem.

Ostensibly designed to alleviate Jerusalem's housing shortage, with some 28,000 units for Jews and Arabs alike, Har Homa was a bold, provocative act by Israel to assert sovereignty over a hotly disputed area.

"We will build in Jerusalem, without conditions, without restrictions," said the then prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu.

His controversial 1997 decision prompted the Palestinian leadership to suspend peace talks with Israel and induced major countries such as Britain, France, Germany, Russia, China and Canada to criticize Israel. Nevertheless, Israel went ahead with the project, which necessitated the expropriation of land from both Jewish and Arab landowners.

Today, Har Homa is almost finished, its stark white Jerusalem stone buildings gleaming in the light and its dearth of greenery quite out of character with the surroundings.

The third and apparently final stage of construction is now well under way on a bare, dusty slope facing an Arab village and Israel's separation barrier, which is supposed to keep terrorists out and may yet define Israel's final border, as Olmert said in March.

An unfinished part of the separation barrier in eastern Jerusalem [RNS/Reuters]

But as Olmert knows, the barrier has caused an uproar. In an advisory judgment, the International Court of Justice in The Hague ruled that it is illegal and should be dismantled.

In Jerusalem's fast-growing metropolitan centre, the barrier takes the form of an imposingly high, ugly concrete wall that snakes through the city ominously and divides neighbourhoods.

This portion of the barrier is but a small section of the 740 kilometre long security fence, whose route along the old Green Line and through the West Bank is determined by topography, population density, threat assessments and political considerations.

Although the government set 2005 as the deadline for completing the barrier in Jerusalem, less than half of it has been finished. Appeals being considered by Israel's Supreme Court mainly account for the delays. In a few cases, the court has ruled that the route should be revised to accommodate the needs of Palestinians.

When the barrier in Jerusalem is completed, an estimated 55,000 Arabs from four neighbourhoods are expected to end up on the Palestinian side of the security fence, while 180,000 Palestinians will find themselves on Israel's side.

According to a report released last October by the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies, the barrier may well increase hostility among Palestinians cut off from Jerusalem, even if it succeeds in preventing the infiltration of suicide bombers, this city's bane. In the past decade, Jerusalem has been rocked by more such bombings than any other city in Israel.

That the route of the barrier in and around Jerusalem is intrusive and has caused considerable inconvenience and hardship to Palestinians is obvious to a visitor.

In New Givon, a settlement in the Givat Ze'ev bloc, a lone Arab house and its inhabitants are grotesquely enclosed by the fence, as if they were lepers.

Judging by graffiti on the wall in Abu Dis, an Arab town adjacent to Jerusalem once touted by Israeli politicians as a substitute capital of a Palestinian state, the barrier arouses immense indignation and anger.

"This wall will soon fall," blares one typical message, scrawled in thick black letters. "Norway supports Palestine," cries another.

Israel has not been deterred by such strident opposition.

The first 300 kilometres of the barrier were completed three years ago and are now operational. The second phase, consisting of 143 kilometres, is currently under construction. Work on an additional 58 kilometres is scheduled to start imminently.

For better or worse, these costly national construction projects – the barrier and Har Homa, among others – are changing the status quo, as well as the face of Jerusalem.

Mosaic festival to celebrate Jewish diversity

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Cultural groups from across the city are coming together to celebrate Jewish diversity at the Jewish Mosaic Festival, to be held June 11 at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

The free daylong festival is hosted by BJCC, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services Toronto and the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, and supported by Chartwell, United Way of Greater Toronto and UJA Federation.

It will feature dance, music, lectures, photo exhibitions, book presentations and a marketplace, as well as a kids' zone, kosher food and movies.

In the evening, there will be a screening of Simcha Jacobovici's movie Quest for the Lost Tribes. Tickets for that program are $10 and reservations are required.

Janet Klein Slavens, supervisor of Fifty-Five Plus, the department of adult services at the BJCC, said that originally, the festival was to be a joint seniors' program between BJCC and Bernard Betel.

"We quickly realized, though, that it was something the whole community could appreciate, and now it has grown and blossomed."

Currently, she says, about 20 countries are confirmed to participate in the festival including China, Jamaica, Turkey, Morocco, Argentina, Uruguay, Czechoslovakia, Ethiopia, Poland and Romania, and each community planned their own exhibit.

Rosalind Silverman, who moved to Canada from Romania nine years ago, is presenting her country's exhibit with her sister Lorelei. It will include a PowerPoint presentation about Romania along with a display of Romanian books and ritual artifacts.

"We want people to know that Romania had a vibrant Jewish community. I don't know how many know that the lyrics for Hatikvah were written there, and the Yiddish theatre, which is still active, was the first in the world."

Tony Alberga, a Jamaican Jew who has lived in Canada since 1976, is putting together a photographic exhibit that shows the Jewish presence in Jamaica over the last 350 years.

"Jews have been practising their religion, and been involved in island politics since 1665. My own family goes back 200 years," he says.

"The beauty of this festival is that it shows people that Jews have come here from every corner of the world."

Klein Slavens says that the three agencies involved have brought the festival to life, "but the volunteers from within the various communities have made it happen. To me, that is what community is all about – when everyone works together."

For information on the festival or to volunteer, call 416-636-1880, ext. 296.

The Rabbi Jacob Mendel Kirshenblatt Endowment Annual Lecture
Laura Blumenfeld

In 1986, Laura Blumenfeld's father was shot in Jerusalem by a member of a rebel faction of the PLO responsible for attacks on several tourists in the Old City. Her father lived, but Blumenfeld's desire for revenge haunted her Revenge: A Story of Hope is her story. A rare, ambitious, personal, and intellectual tour of dark urges often denied, Revenge: A Story of Hope is a beautifully written story about family, loyalty, and home, about the personal passions behind public events, and about the thin line between love and hate.

Move to day school came as 'a shock' at first

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Superficially, jewelry-making and education don't have a lot in common.

"They are our teachers..."

In fact, Isaac Hollander – a teacher at Yeshivat Or Chaim and its sister school, Ulpanat Orot, who is also a sessional lecturer at the University of Toronto – was inspired in part to take his first jewelry course because he saw how satisfying it was for a physics professor he knew to spend time absorbed in wood-turning, a hobby completely unrelated to his field.

Hollander took a night course in jewelry-making at a local high school a few years ago, after moving back to Toronto from Ann Arbor, Mich., where he completed work on his PhD in Jewish Social History. He received the degree from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in 2001.

His interest in jewelry led to increasingly advanced courses at George Brown College, and his hobby has since grown into a business sideline called Kito Creations.

But when Hollander talks about the wedding rings he creates, there is a marked similarity to his observations about his high school students.

Isaac Hollander

"The gold and silver are entwined [in a] seamless connection, but each element maintains its uniqueness," he says of the traditional Japanese technique, Mokume Gane, that he uses to fuse the two metals.

Similarly, he is conscious of the different backgrounds of the students he teaches, and tries to bring that out when it is relevant to his lessons – a likely possibility in his Grade 12 "History of the Modern Middle East" class, in which some students may have family roots in Middle Eastern countries. By highlighting those connections, "they can celebrate their background in this environment," he said.

"I like them to realize what their own traditions are," said Hollander, who also teaches Hebrew language and Canadian geography. He is the only teacher at the school to teach both Jewish and general studies.

Hollander's own background is somewhat eclectic. The 41-year-old author of Jews and Muslims in Lower Yemen: A Study in Protection and Restraint, 1918-1949, whose wife is of Yemeni background, was born to a British father and an Egyptian mother. "We are a family that meshes together both modernity and tradition, as well as the east and the west."

As a child attending Eitz Chaim Schools (he later attended Associated Hebrew Schools), he felt "exactly in the middle" between the mainstream Ashkenazi demographic and North African newcomers.

Before high school, Hollander spent most of his childhood in Toronto – with the exception of a year in London, England and another year in Florence, Italy, when his father Samuel, an economics professor now at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, was on sabbatical. He attended high school in Jerusalem.

A lesson from the teacher: "One of the most valuable things I think kids can get at home is for the home to cultivate curiosity and wonder at whatever is around you."

Hollander was finishing post-doctoral work when he was asked if he could fill in for a teacher on maternity leave at Netivot Hatorah Day School. Previously, he had never considered teaching outside of a university.

"It was a serious shock, like being hit by a tidal wave," he said of juggling seven Grade 6, 7 and 8 Hebrew and Jewish studies classes. "It took me a week or two to kind of surface."

Once he did, he said, it was "a lot of fun." He is now working on a Master's degree in education and administration at Yeshiva University.

At the end of his stint at Netivot, he was approached by Frank Samuels, principal of the B'nai Akiva schools where he is currently on staff, to teach geography and anthropology.

It was a good fit. "I've been able to bring my methods and the themes I care for to this school. I'm very fortunate that way," said Hollander. It was at his suggestion that the school began using a computer system called Geographic Information Systems in the geography course he teaches. Samuels says it is "incredibly powerful as a [learning] tool."

Hollander later began teaching Hebrew at the school, when a colleague went on maternity leave.

Although Hollander – despite his university teaching experience and academic expertise – had no degree in education initially, Samuels did not hesitate to hire him, confident that he was "a superb educator."

Jewish Life

Why we chose not to take part

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH

"'I have learned that the Holocaust was a unique and uniquely Jewish event, albeit with universal implications. Not all victims were Jews, but all Jews were victims."

–Elie Wiesel, April 19, 1985, on the occasion of his receiving the U.S. Congressional Medal of Honour.

Elie Wiesel's words hold particular meaning for me, in that all Jews, those now living and those yet to be born, are scarred by the horror of the Shoah. This is because we all understand that the Shoah as planned by the Nazis sought to annihilate the Jewish people from the face of the planet.

Guest Voice

Historian and author Rabbi Berel Wein writes of a massive warehouse that Adolf Hitler had filled with Judaica from all the shtetlach and cities that had been made Judenrein. Rabbi Wein writes that Hitler did this in order to one day have a museum to remind the world of what the Jewish people were. Yet, to accomplish this heinous and horrific plan, he would need to destroy every living Jew. Every Jew. Every man, woman and child alive.

And so, a proper memorial would embrace this simple, horrible truth. It would give proper significance to the threat that was over the heads of each Jew. For that reason, Yad Vashem and other Holocaust museums have special memorials to the children who perished, to the women who were abused and to the handicapped. They all need to be remembered.

For the past 10 years in Toronto, at the insistence of the former consul general of Israel, Jehudi Kinar, we have had a community-wide Yom Hashoah memorial service in Earl Bales Park. Prior to this, we had a roster of community memorials, each one frequently competing with another. The idea of having one large memorial was quickly supported by the Toronto Board of Rabbis, whose members are the spiritual leaders of many of Toronto's synagogues. It was believed that having the community draw together, and not apart, in these moments had great value and meaning. We still believe that.

However, this month, the Toronto Board of Rabbis withdrew its endorsement of the memorial and did not intend to participate. This was done with a heavy and sad heart.

This action was taken because we believe that the standards of this exceptional Jewish community are being threatened. Organizers of this year's program invited only the boys from a mixed children's choir, although this same choir had performed for the chief rabbi of Rome at the dinner celebrating the 40th anniversary of the Nostra Aetate in Toronto this past November. This year, the Toronto Board of Rabbis was also informed that women would be permitted to have only specific, limited roles in the community memorial.

Faced with this undermining of the most basic notions of what a Holocaust memorial should be, and ever-mindful of the fact that men, women and children perished in the Holocaust because they were Jews, we could not participate in a memorial that marginalized women or children in any way, shape or form.

The Toronto Board of Rabbis includes more than 45 rabbis from the Toronto area, rabbis from all streams of Judaism. The board is responsible for the accreditation of local rabbis and is the voice of mainstream religious Judaism in the city. The members of the Toronto Board of Rabbis lead our synagogues, educate in our schools, comfort the ill in our hospitals and guide our community in happy and challenging times. As Toronto's Jewish community continues to grow, the board is dedicated to ensuring that our Jewish values grow along with it.

It is our belief that we can find a way to gather as a community to commemorate and celebrate in a way that embraces unity without requiring uniformity. It is our belief that there should be no reason not to permit men, women and children to participate equally in a Holocaust memorial, if only because they were all equal victims of the Holocaust. It is our belief that such a memorial would be one that is not framed by the imposition of religious principles, but by recognition of what communal standards best reflect the diverse and rich fabric of our Jewish community.

This is the position of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, and it is also among our guiding values.

Our Internet seder

By ESTHER BUDD

As any woman who has ever prepared a seder can tell you, you have to be a caterer, shopper, event planner, furniture mover, dishwasher, choirmaster and photographer.

This year, we had to find a solution to a serious problem. Our son Nathan, who attends McGill University in Montreal, had an exam and couldn't join us for the second seder. Our daughter, Belinda Fireman, who lives in Calgary with her husband, J.P. Bechtold, and their children, Olivia, Zoe and Cyrus, couldn't join us because Cyrus is just two weeks old.

Guest Voice

We had to find a way to make Nathan, our daughter and her family a part of the seder. To solve the problem, I suggested we use our webcam to bring us all together. My husband, Stan, loved the idea, but because he isn't exactly computer savvy, and I am the resident computer guru (not hard when there are only two of you), I had to add organizing the technical aspect of the seder to my other duties.

After a full week of cooking, cleaning and preparing, it all seemed to come together. But the seder looked iffy an hour before the service was to begin.

We asked my two brothers and their families along with my eldest son, James Fireman, and his fiancé, Emily McKernan, to be at our house by 6 p.m.

One problem was that everyone was coming from Toronto. They all left on time, but as luck would have it, traffic that night was different from all other nights. My brothers and my son called to tell us they would be at least an hour late, which meant we wouldn't get started until close to 8 p.m.

The second problem was that an hour before the appointed time, I was unable to connect to both of my children on the Internet. I tried everything, but the signal was not good, and I became very frustrated. Add to that, the fact that every five minutes, one of the families travelling from Toronto called to say that they would be late, very late in fact. By then, I was wondering why on earth I had put so much effort into preparing the seder. Stan and I thought of sitting ourselves down at either end of the seder table and taking a picture to show the seder for which no one came.

Someone was looking out for us, though. At about 6:30 p.m., I decided to try to connect to my son and daughter through the Internet again and was surprised, and pleased, to discovered that I got through. We all chatted a bit, and I kept going over to the ovens and turning the heat down lower.

By 7:15, my brother Bob and his family arrived at the same time as my brother-in-law Howie, who was followed very quickly by James and Emily. My brother Tom called to say he had taken a wrong turn and was in Hamilton. We were so late already that it really didn't matter. By the time we all sat down to the table, it was well past 8 p.m. It was so wonderful, then, to see everyone together.

The women lit the candlesticks in front of them and said the brachah. Nathan in Montreal said the Kiddush, and we had three renditions of the four questions. My nephew Jacob, the youngest at the seder, asked the questions first, next came my granddaughters Olivia and Zoe in Calgary, followed by Emily, who has been teaching herself to read Hebrew. Awesome. That made the whole experience worthwhile.

We sang and enjoyed one another's company until quite late. It was a wonderful evening. Throughout the seder, the kids in Calgary and Nathan in Montreal were there watching and participating, or talking to us. I'm sure from their end it wasn't as much fun, but from our point of view it helped us feel that the whole family was together on one of our most important holidays.

When your family cannot be together, an Internet seder is definitely an option worth considering.

Hirings and firings

Money Matters

Jay Kelman

Earlier this month, French authorities faced fierce opposition to a proposed law granting employers the right to dismiss young workers after two years on the job. Under current French law, it's next to impossible to fire workers, and employers are understandably hesitant to hire workers they can't fire, leading to extremely high unemployment rates, especially among youth. (This reality has hit the Muslim youth of France hard, leading to its own set of social issues.) The new law was meant to give youth the opportunity to find employment, but it created an extreme backlash.

The proposed law would find much favour in Jewish law. The Talmud was faced with a similar dilemma regarding loans. Jewish law states that the testimony of two witnesses is required in order to collect a debt, and these witnesses must be thoroughly cross-examined. In order to avoid the hardship of this demanding process, lenders simply stopped granting loans. It was just not worth their while.

The sages of the Talmud, realizing the social harm that was being caused, relaxed the requirements necessary to collect outstanding loans. In order "not to close the door on borrowers," the sages no longer required detailed cross-examination (drisha v'chakira) of witnesses and also allowed non-licensed (i.e., those without proper smichah) people to serve as judges. While there was some potential risk of unwarranted collection, the overall benefit to society was undeniable, opening up the way for economic opportunities for the needy.

A similar problem prompted the great talmudic sage Hillel to introduce the pruzbul, a legal mechanism that allows lenders to collect loans that were left outstanding during the shmittah (sabbatical) year. As part of the laws of the shmittah year, all outstanding loans are cancelled. The Torah warns against the "evil" of denying loans prior to the beginning of a sabbatical year out of fear the borrower will purposely not pay it back before the end of the year, rendering the loan uncollectible. Despite the warning, human nature being what it is, many people did avoid granting loans, and Hillel enacted the pruzbul not only to protect lenders, but to ensure that funds would be available for borrowers.

Similarly, the heter iska, developed during the Middle Ages, allowed Jews to charge "interest" on "loans" to fellow Jews, ultimately benefiting society as a whole. In matters of civil law, it's the right and duty of our sages to examine the overall impact of current law and to make adjustments where necessary. This is what the Talmud refers to as tikkun olam, repairing the world. It appears quite obvious, to me at least, that in the case of the French legislation, while some youth may have been fired from jobs they received, many more, including those to be dismissed in the future, would have attained jobs they otherwise would not have had. And that is a law worth having.

Most likely, Jewish law sees no need for such a law in the first place. Judaism does not grant automatic tenure. According to most authorities, an employer has no obligation to renew an employee's contract after its termination date. Terms of the contract indicate that the job is of a temporary nature. Even Rabbi Moshe Feinstein – who argued that absent incompetence, a worker retains a right to his or her job when a contract expires – agreed that by specifically stating in a contract that a job is of a temporary nature, an employer can avoid the granting of "tenure." And all agree that an employer may lay off workers in cases of economic distress.

The goal of Jewish employment law is finding the proper balance between the rights of employers and employees.

Remembering Israel's fallen

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

At 11 o'clock on the morning of May 2, Israel will come to a standstill.

On that day, sirens will blare and Israelis and Jews around the world - will pause to remember the thousands of soldiers who paid the ultimate sacrifice for their country. Today, a look at Yom Hazikaron, Remembrance Day for the fallen of Israel's wars.

Start by looking at their faces. Israel's Ministry of Defence has created a moving site to remember the fallen. Even if you cannot read Hebrew, it is heartbreaking to flip through the yizkor pages and look at photographs of the young men and women who gave their lives for the country. And if you can read Hebrew, pause to read a few biographies to learn about the lives cut short. [http://www.izkor.gov.il/izkor40.htm] (Click on the alphabetical links at the centre of the screen to go to the biographies.)

More than 20,000 soldiers have fallen since Israel's War of Independence. The Orthodox Union site traces the number of casualties and summarizes the major battles from pre-State battles through the next 50 years. [http://tinyurl.com/kuox2] The most casual tourist to Israel will no doubt have noticed the many striking monuments that dot the country. You can look at photos of 29 of those memorials at the Yad Labanim website [http://tinyurl.com/fdt3w]

As those monuments become the focus of services on Yom Hazikaron, Yizkor will be chanted, Kaddish will be uttered and poetry will be recited. A Hebrew poetry page has collected the works of some of the country's premier poets including Natan Alterman, Naomi Shemer and Chana Senesh. It includes King David's lament from the Book of Samuel II upon hearing of the deaths of Jonathan and Saul, "How the mighty have fallen." [http://www.izkor.gov.il/izkor30a.htm] You can read selected poems in English at the American Zionist Movement page. [http://www.azm.org/yh_program.shtml]

"The sword is worse than death, famine is harder than the sword, captivity is worst of all..." (Babylonian Talmud, Tractate Bava Batra 8b) – from the homepage of The International Coalition for Missing Israeli Soldiers

Ron Arad is Israel's best-known missing soldier. Unfortunately, he is not alone. This site also tells the stories of Zvi Feldman, Zachary Baumel and Yehuda Katz. According to the site, in June 1982, Feldman, Baumel and Katz were captured at the battle of Sultan Yakoub, Lebanon. There have been many conflicting reports regarding their whereabouts and condition, but they remain unaccounted for. The coalition continues to work for their release. [http://www.mia.org.il/]

For children living outside Israel, it can be difficult to understand the importance of Yom Hazikaron. Several sites provide lesson plans, activities, readings and suggestions such as twinning programs with Israeli schools in order to make the day relevant. [http://tinyurl.com/hg6yk] and [http://tinyurl.com/mx4b7]

It is almost impossible to understand the grief of a small country that has given up 20,000 of its young. That's why an article about the loss of one soldier has such an impact. In His Name was Nachshon Wachsman, Esther Wachsman tells about how her son was kidnapped and held ransom by the Hamas in October 1994. The IDF launched a military rescue that failed and Nachshon and the commander of the rescue mission were both killed. [http://tinyurl.com/h72tl]

"The entire nation mourned with us," Esther Wachsman writes. "Thousands came to comfort us, though no one can comfort a bereaved parent... Food and drink were delivered non-stop to our home; bus and taxi drivers who brought people from all over the country who wished to express their condolences left their vehicles and joined their passengers in our home. That unity, solidarity, caring, compassion and love with which we were showered gave us strength and filled our hearts with love for our people. After the shivah, we all returned to our routines... for that is what the Jewish people have always done – rebuilt after destruction, began new lives from the ashes and blood of the old."

There's good reason to fear Iran's president

Iran's recent announcement that it had enriched a small quantity of uranium received extensive media coverage. While the uranium was reportedly only enriched to 3.5 per cent purity, and weapons-grade uranium requires 90 per cent purity, Western analysts estimate that it's only a matter of two to three years before Iran reaches the needed threshold.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Israel has warned that it won't stand by while its sworn enemy accelerates its nuclear program in defiance of the international community. Iran's nuclear ambitions are also opposed by the United States and some European countries, including Britain, France and Germany.

The National Post news brief "Israel will be annihilated by 'one storm,' Iranian president warns" (April 15) reported: "President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran appeared to threaten Israel with a nuclear attack yesterday when he described it as a 'rotten, dried tree' that would be annihilated by 'one storm.'" The story said Ahmadinejad's comments were "his most vitriolic and anti-Semitic to date."

Some analysts downplay reports of Iran's determination to develop nuclear weapons. For example, in an interview on Newshour (PBS, April 14), Prof. William Beeman of Brown University assured host Margaret Warner that even if Iran were to develop such weapons, "its primary purpose would be defensive, as Iran has continually asserted in its presentation of its conventional weapons program."

When Warner asked Beeman specifically whether Ahmadinaejad's repeated threats to "wipe Israel off the face of the Earth" and "annihilate" it would not cause Israel great concern should Iran acquire nuclear weapons, Beeman dismissed Ahmadinejad's extreme anti-Israel statements as a defensive reaction "to the attacks and extreme statements that have been made against Iran by the United States."

Beeman should read "Ahmadinejad's Demons" by Matthias Küntzel (New Republic, April 24). A German political scientist and author of Jihad and Jew-Hatred, Küntzel makes the case for taking Ahmadinejad among other Iranian leaders at his word.

Küntzel points out that during the Iran-Iraq war of the 1980s, Ahmadinejad was an instructor in the Basiji, a "volunteer militia" that used Iranian teenagers and children, some as young as 12, to clear minefields or sacrifice themselves in human waves against heavily armed Iraqi soldiers. Over the years, they were killed in the tens of thousands and lauded as "martyrs."

Today, the Basiji legacy "is a source not of national shame, but of growing pride" and members have achieved political power. Explains Küntzel: "Since the end of hostilities against Iraq in 1988, the Basiji have grown both in numbers and influence. They have been deployed, above all, as a vice squad to enforce religious law in Iran, and their elite 'special units' have been used as shock troops against anti-government forces…

"And, last year, they formed the potent core of the political base that propelled Mahmoud Ahmadinejad… to the presidency."

Since Ahmadinejad became president, Küntzel writes "the influence of the Basiji has grown. In November, the new Iranian president opened the annual 'Basiji Week,' which commemorates the martyrs of the Iran-Iraq War. According to a report in Kayan, a [government] publication… some nine million Basiji – 12 per cent of the Iranian population – turned out to demonstrate in favour of Ahmadinejad's anti-liberal platform. The article claimed that the demonstrators 'form[ed] a human chain some 8,700 kilometers long… In Tehran alone, some 1,250,000 people turned out.' Barely noticed by the Western media, this mobilization attests to Ahmadinejad's determination to impose his 'second revolution' and to extinguish the few sparks of freedom in Iran."

Küntzel adds: "The Basiji's cult of self-destruction would be chilling in any country. In the context of the Iranian nuclear program, however, its obsession with martyrdom amounts to a lit fuse."

In Ahmadinejad's fanatical world-view, a nuclear conflagration, a form of Armageddon, might be just what is required to hasten his vision of an ideal afterlife. If he willingly sacrificed so many of Iran's own youth during the Iran-Iraq war, it's not hard to imagine what he has in store for Israelis

The article's chilling conclusion: "The history of the Basiji shows that we must expect monstrosities from the current Iranian regime."

Food, Scrumptious Food

Salad dressing recipe — pass it on!

BY SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

I am often asked, "Is this an original recipe?" But very few recipes are totally original. Most are variations on a theme, and usually bear the name of the person who gave it to you.

I had dinner one night with my friends the Shochats not too long ago, and Rhoda Shochat served the most wonderful salad. I obtained the recipe from her and have been making it non-stop ever since. I can't get enough of it… and neither can my guests. I call it Rhoda's Salad Dressing.

I brought this salad to the cast party of a local production of Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat and no fewer than six people asked me for the recipe. One woman was standing near the buffet table when I came to pick up the empty bowl after the party. She didn't know who had made it and decided to wait to see who came for the bowl to ask for the recipe.

I called Shochat to ask her if she minded if I used the recipe in my column. Her response was, "Only if you give credit to Estelle, the person who gave it to me."

So, here's Sue's/Rhoda's/Estelle's salad dressing… And I'm sure that Estelle got it from someone else! But by whatever name you call it, it's yummy!

2½ tbsp. lemon juice
1½ tbsp. vinegar
1 tsp. garlic salt or regular salt
½ cup sugar
½ cup oil
1 bunch dill, finely chopped
6 cloves or more garlic, sliced
¼ cup coarsely chopped almonds
1 head lettuce
½ cup dried cranberries, optional

In food processor, or with hand blender, process first four ingredients. Slowly add oil until well blended. Add chopped dill and blend well.

In a small amount of oil, fry garlic and almonds until lightly browned. Drain and set aside. When ready to serve, toss all ingredients together.

Obituary

Raicus was principal at Holy Blossom

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Ethel Raicus believed that the senior years could be the richest period of a person's life. The translator, award-winning artist and former principal of Holy Blossom Temple's Hebrew school, who died April 11 of a heart attack at age 86, lived that philosophy.

In her 70s, she studied Yiddish at Oxford University, later serving as a translator and editor of Found Treasures: Stories by Yiddish Women Writers.

"Her place was filled with books, her [modern, abstract] artwork, and musical instruments," said social worker and photographer Irene Borins Ash, who profiled Raicus in her book Treasured Legacies, which features stories about positive aging, even in the face of difficulties.

Raicus had "a tremendous range of passions," said Margie Wolfe, publisher and president of Second Story Press, which published both of the aforementioned books.

Wolfe, a friend for the past 16 or 17 years after meeting Raicus in a Yiddish study group, said the older woman "was frail in her body, but her mind was sharp as a tack.

"She loved learning and she loved talking to younger people about what they were learning and about what they were interested in. She was an extraordinary personality."

Raicus also enjoyed going to new places. "We were always trying new restaurants," said Wolfe. "She went to theatre and movies, and had a tremendous passion for opera."

In fact, in recent years Raicus travelled to Vienna and New York to attend performances by opera singer Adrianne Pieczonka, a relative on her mother's side.

Raicus was born in Toronto, and raised by her mother Slaava, a Russian immigrant who had a grocery store on Queen Street, and who worked as a cook in the 1930s and late 1920s at a Jewish summer camp for mothers and children. Her parents separated when she was six.

As a child, she took art lessons at what was then the Art Gallery of Toronto (now the Art Gallery of Ontario) from renowned painters Doris McCarthy and Arthur Lismer, Wolfe said.

Raicus graduated high school from Central Technical School, said her cousin Elizabeth Cooper. She was the first woman to graduate as an industrial designer from the Ontario College of Art, and one of the first women to work as a graphic artist in advertising.

In the late 1940s, she moved to Israel, where she worked on a kibbutz, teaching European immigrant children. She returned to Toronto only because she had contracted polio and was advised she would receive better care here, said Wolfe.

Raicus, an only child who never married and who never had children of her own, was "a very devoted daughter and niece," said Cooper. She was also "a very devoted and conscientious teacher and principal," said Rabbi Michael Stroh, who spent five years at Holy Blossom from 1966 to 1971 during part of Raicus' 35-year tenure. "She had high standards and expected the kids to live up to them. And they did."

She also had a wide circle of friends and admirers, evidenced by the turnout at her funeral, which necessitated the use of the Holy Blossom sanctuary rather than a smaller room.

Moderates win Concordia undergrad elections

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In a record turnout of 30 per cent, Concordia University undergraduates voted for a moderate executive of the Concordia Student Union (CSU).

The slate, called Experience and headed by Kahleed Juma, received 3,725 votes compared to runner-up Conscious, which got 3,188 votes. A total of 7,887 ballots were cast over three days for five slates. The university has 26,136 undergraduates.

Experience will take office for one year at the end of this term.

Experience was all but officially endorsed by the Hillel Jewish student association, which regards it as similar to the Evolution group that has been in office for the past three years. Hillel has credited Evolution with helping to restore harmony on campus after the turbulent 2002-2003 school year that began with a violent protest against a speaking engagement on campus by former Israeli Benjamin Netanyahu.

Hillel conducted an active campaign to get the vote out this year.

The CSU had been dominated for a few years by highly politicized left-wing factions, which critics considered anarchist, corrupt and anti-Israel.

"I couldn't ask for a better result. It's a big mandate," said Steven Rosenshein, the CSU's current vice-president of communications and a former Hillel vice-president. He believes the turnout may be a record for a Canadian university, even those that have online voting. Voting at Concordia is by traditional paper ballot.

Rosenshein was defeated in his bid to be one of two student representatives on the university's board of governors, but he was successful in getting a seat on the senate.

Rosenshein had charged that Conscious was a moderate front for a number of radicals from the past seeking to regain their influence.

The election, however, was not without controversy.

Conscious leader Svetla Turnin protested the late appearance on the ballot of a slate with a very similar name to her group.

Conscious Concordia, headed by David Zand, who has been active with Hillel, was removed from the ballot after the first day of voting. The slate reappeared for about 90 minutes the following day, apparently after a threat of legal action by Conscious Concordia, but was then taken off again.

The CSU's judicial board ruled that chief electoral officer Danniella Brazel did have the power to strike the slate from the ballot because of the potential for confusion among voters.

B'nai Brith drops rights complaint

B'nai Brith Canada has withdrawn a human rights complaint against Concordia University that said the school discriminated against Jewish students and the community in general.

In a complaint lodged with the Quebec Human Rights Commission 1½ years ago, B'nai Brith alleged Concordia was suppressing "the Jewish voice" on campus by balking at inviting former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak because of security concerns.

Gerry Weinstein, B'nai Brith's national president, and Allan Adel, national chair of the organization's League for Human Rights, said in a joint statement that the complaint has been dropped "in consideration of the positive steps being taken by Concordia University's new administration... We have come to the conclusion that our concerns are being met."

B'nai Brith has been in discussions with Concordia president Claude Lajeunesse, who succeeded Frederick Lowy in August 2005.

In its complaint, B'nai Brith cited violations by Concordia of the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, which protects freedom of expression and assembly, and also protects access to public places and against harassment. The complaint also spoke of a "poisoned atmosphere" for Jewish students since 2001, "when the university allowed the dissemination of a student handbook that contained anti-Semitic material, glorified violence and advocated civil disobedience" by the Concordia Student Union.

B'nai Brith alleged this permission led to the violent demonstration the following year against another former Israeli prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, who was prevented by protesters from speaking on campus. After that, Jewish students were "subjected to harassment, intimidation and even assault, which the university has refused or neglected to prevent," B'nai Brith stated in its complaint to the commission.

B'nai Brith now sees a less menacing atmosphere at Concordia.

Hillel, student council spar over speaker

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Hillel at York wants the York Federation of Students to backtrack on its implication that Hillel is a racist organization after the student council demanded that Hillel apologize for comments about radical Islam by a speaker the Jewish group invited on campus.

Nonie Darwish, an Egyptian-born, pro-Israel Arab American and former Muslim, spoke on March 29 at York University in a talk titled, "Why I support the State of Israel."

Adam Hummel, president of Hillel at York, said Darwish caught him and other organizers off guard when she strayed from her announced topic to criticize radical Islam.

After the lecture, Hummel said he spoke to members of the campus group Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights who were offended by Darwish's comments, and he said he apologized to those who approached him.

Within hours of the lecture, the YFS issued a public statement in which Ahmed Habib, YFS' vice-president of equity and services, and Shamini Selvaratnam, YFS' vice-president of education, demanded a formal apology from Hillel and condemned the organization for Darwish's remarks, which they described as racist and Islamophobic.

"[The lecture] further increases tension on campus between students surrounding a [sic] already sensitive topic. York Federation of Students is alarmed that such racist remarks would be condoned by a well-established organization like Hillel."

Tilly Shames, Israel affairs director at Hillel of Greater Toronto, said the statements paints Hillel as a racist organization.

"We felt Hillel, at least Hillel at York, was being presented as an Islamophobic organization, and we're concerned that the YFS has spread this message to the campus community and student groups… We won't stand for that," Shames said.

They are pointing a finger at us and insinuating that our organization is Islamophobic

"They pushed us into a corner," Hummel said. "We issued a statement to Ahmed Habib saying that we stand by [Darwish's] right to freedom of speech. They are pointing a finger at us and insinuating that our organization is Islamophobic. Because we defended her right for freedom of speech, they're suggesting that we agree with her."

Corrie Sakaluk, YSF's president-elect, said she wants Hillel to issue another statement to apologize for and denounce the parts of Darwish's lecture that could be perceived as Islamophobic.

"Freedom of speech is not meant to defend or justify hate speech," Sakaluk said, adding that Darwish made insensitive and hateful comments and "used sections of her time to make sweeping generalizations about Arabic and Muslim people."

Hummel and Keren Katz, Hillel's Israel affairs chair at York, did release a statement to the YFS executive that said "Hillel at York denounces Islamophobia in all its forms," but Shames said she is still waiting for the YFS to release a statement of its own saying it "recognizes Hillel as a diverse and pluralistic organization that condemns racism of all kinds."

She said she hopes a future YFS statement will put Hillel in a more positive light and will not further tarnish the group's name.

Although the YFS has yet to release such a statement, Sakaluk said in an interview with The CJN that her group's "comments are not meant to paint Hillel as a racist organization," but she added that since Darwish was Hillel's guest, Hillel should take responsibility for her comments.

Shames said Hillel is also deciding how to respond to an article in York's main student newspaper, Excalibur, that misquoted Darwish and took her words out of context.

The article misquoted Darwish as saying that "most Muslims are terrorists." However, what Darwish actually said was that statistically, "most terrorists are Muslims."

"It may seem like semantics, but there is a major difference between the two statements," Shames said.

She added that Sakaluk declined to help Hillel tackle the issue with Excalibur.

"She seems to have disassociated herself from the issue and suggested we approach the editor of the newspaper," Shames said.

Unfortunately, Shames added, the issue the article appeared in was the last one of the semester, and another issue won't be published until May.

Sakaluk told The CJN that "she sympathizes with Hillel" about the article.

Seders in Japan, with matzah at $10 a box

By BENJI FELDMAN
Special to The CJN

Guest Voice

KOBE, Japan — Between a mountain's green slopes and the waves of the Pacific Ocean lies a small Japanese port city named Kobe. It has a large number of foreign residents and is home to one of only two Jewish communities in Japan.

When climbing up the city's steep hill, you notice the fashionable shops lining the street. Halfway up the mountain, you walk along a number of thin roads with stone sidewalks. You think of Jerusalem, and you feel at home.

At the end of this winding trail, halfway up the mountain, you find Ohel Shelomo Synagogue, a large building by Japanese standards and my host for the two seders this year.

The synagogue hosts between 10 and 30 people every Shabbat. Its membership is low, and those people who do belong are mostly Israelis who have settled in Kobe.

The members befriended me and satisfied my thirst for Jewish sights and sounds. Their authentic Israeli accents were such a treat. My Hebrew came back to me quickly, and I found myself feeling as if I was back in Israel.

At the the first seder, 200 travellers and residents joined in for some imported kosher food. And with the seder's lively 80 or so Israeli participants, it was difficult to hear anything, let alone follow along, but I managed.

Israeli seder highlights included some digital photography, the lighting of cigarettes from the candles on the table and one young man who decided to half-moon some onlookers.

Rabbi Asaf Tobi is quite a leader. He's an Israeli Chabadnick who recently fathered his second son (whose name, unfortunately, escapes me).

On the floor of Rabbi Asaf's living room slept two Chabad shlichim, a local Jewish man who snores in a very peculiar way, and me.

Mendy, the rabbi's eldest son, was the alarm clock for all the guests in the apartment. He never failed to casually walk into the room at 6:30 a.m. with his toy truck, ringing its bells as if he was in a Santa Claus parade.

First time I had witnessed a bris

After Shacharit on the Friday morning of Pesach, Rabbi Asaf held his son in his lap as a mohel, flown in from Israel for the special simchah, circumcised the rabbi's son.

It was the first time I had witnessed a bris, and I squeezed the arm of the Israeli stranger next to me as the event took place. After the audience exhaled and the baby's cries subsided, the room erupted in mazel tovs and dances.

The bris was an extra special experience that I was thrilled to share with the community.

To get me through the holiday, I bought three boxes of imported matzah for the equivalent of a measly $10 each. I also procured a stock of tuna, potatoes, vegetables and salt. Packing my lunch has become my favourite pastime.

And there's nothing like explaining what matzah is to a Japanese person. If you leave it at, "It's a kind of cracker," you can save yourself about three hours a day!

I can't wait to hear the stories about the seders of friends and family back in Canada. And though it's been a great experience to be here in Japan, Pesach makes me realize how difficult it is to be away from home and how much I miss my friends and family.

Coast to Coast

Cotler says Canada can play role in both Afghanistan and Sudan

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canada can play a role in both the Afghanistan and the Sudan conflicts, mainly through diplomacy in the latter case, Liberal public safety critic Irwin Cotler said in the House of Commons.

"I want to say that I do not think this is a matter of these two being mutually exclusive," the Mount Royal MP said during a special debate on the Afghanistan mission.

"I believe that Canada, in addition to Afghanistan, can play... a robust diplomatic role and can exercise moral and political leadership... I believe that a robust diplomatic initiative can do that without in any way impugning or undermining our involvement in Afghanistan."

Irwin Cotler

Cotler was responding to a question from Alberta Conservative MP Leon Benoit (Vegreville-Wainwright) on whether he was suggesting that Canada should shift its focus from Afghanistan to the three-year-old conflict in Darfur in western Sudan.

"Canada cannot be involved in all missions," Benoit said. "Canada may choose to be involved in Darfur at some time down the road. I have no way of knowing that. It will be examined in the future."

Cotler used the Afghanistan debate to spell out a 10-point "action plan" he proposes to ease the humanitarian crisis in Darfur, where he said "mass atrocity, including war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide by attrition" continue with impunity.

Cotler is spearheading the all-party Save Darfur Parliamentary Coalition, which was launched at a press conference on Parliament Hill April 6.

Cotler reiterated his support for Canada's military deployment in Afghanistan, as well as for assistance in the country's democratic development and holding accountable those responsible for past abuses.

He noted that he had taken the same position during a debate on Afghanistan in the House on Jan. 28, 2002.

The Darfur coalition is urging the United Nations to expand the African Union (AU) forces' mandate in Sudan to give it authority to intervene militarily to protect civilians. The coalition is also demanding the immediate addition of 5,000 international troops to the 7,000 AU forces now in Sudan.

Cotler told The CJN these could come from individual countries or through the United Nations or NATO, for example.

The coalition wants 20,000 troops in place by October to enforce an expected ceasefire and help assist with refugee return.

Cotler did not call for a major increase in Canada's military presence. He said Canada could contribute a headquarters brigade, for instance, which would control artillery movements.

Canada is currently providing limited military and technical assistance to the African Union. This includes up to 80 Canadian military and civilian police personnel, as well as helicopters, transport aircraft and armoured personnel carriers, basic equipment, and lending expertise. But its financial allocation of $170 million makes it one of the mission's top three international donors, according to government information.

Other points of the action plan include disarming the Janjaweed, the Arab militias carrying out the violence upon the indigenous black population,which, by many reports, have the backing of the Muslim government in Khartoum; support for "targeted sanctions against government leaders;" and bringing the perpetrators of atrocities before the International Criminal Court.

In addition to Cotler, the participants in the launching of the coalition were Stéphane Dion (Cartierville-St. Laurent), the foreign affairs critic who has since announced his bid for the Liberal leadership; Keith Martin (Esquimalt-Juan de Fuca), critic for the Canadian International Development Agency; Conservative James Lunney (Nanaimo-Alberni); and Max Kelly, a University of Toronto student representing Students Taking Action Now: Darfur (STAND Canada).

Cotler said he founded the coalition to "sound the alarm, to shatter the silence, regarding the ongoing crimes against humanity" in Darfur.

Cotler said retired general and Senator Roméo Dallaire, whose warning of an impending massacre fell on deaf ears while he was commander of the UN forces in Rwanda in 1994, has since joined the coalition.

Cotler told The CJN the Martin government, in which he was justice minister, did "comparatively better than other governments" in dealing with Darfur, but it "was not as sustained as it should have been - it needed to be a bigger priority."

Quebec 'oblivious' to Islamists, Pipes says

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Analyst raps Israeli policy; urges Palestinians to accept defeat

MONTREAL — Quebec shows a "complete disregard" for the number of potential radical Islamists who might be streaming into the province, and it's "by far, the worst of any area in North America" in this regard, controversial Middle East analyst Daniel Pipes said in Montreal recently.

Responding to a question from the audience during a State of Israel Bonds event at Congregation Beth Tikvah, Pipes added that the province seems "oblivious to the problem" and shows an "unwillingness" to deal with it.

Pipes, founder of the Philadelphia-based Middle East Forum and Campus Watch, compared Quebec to the Netherlands and Sweden, which he said initially ignored the rise in militant Islamism in those countries, among both immigrants and native-born Muslims.

"It's a big problem in Quebec," Pipes said, suggesting that like the two European nations, Quebec's traits as a "liberal society… disinclined to judge," combined with an "open immigration" policy, could spell big trouble within 20 years.

He said the mentality in the province is that if a terrorist incident were to occur, the attitude would be, "What did we do wrong?"

Pipes said the "single most specific thing" Quebec authorities should do is to have a "full-time person" following the situation.

(Repeated calls to Quebec Immigration Minister Lise Theriault and her press attaché Marie Paradis for comment on Pipes' remarks were not returned.)

In his formal talk, Pipes said the only way Israelis and Palestinians will find peace is if one side actually "gives up," instead of Israel pursuing policies that merely involve trying to "manage" and "control" the conflict.

"Since 1948, Israel's war goal has been to win acceptance, and the Arab war goal has been to eliminate Israel," he said.

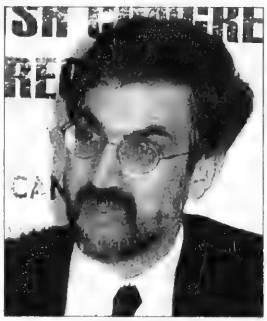
"Only one of the goals can prevail."

Israel, he said, makes a mistake in focusing its policies on what Israel does instead of on the Palestinians.

Israel's disengagement from Gaza last year was a mistake because it gave Palestinians renewed hope that Israel will eventually be gone for good, Pipes said.

"Anything that dissuades the Palestinians from seeing that their goal can be achieved [would] be positive… Disengagement made Palestinians feel closer to eliminating Israel."

Pipes said Israel's policy of unilateralism "does not address the basic question… and if not addressed, the conflict goes on and on."



Daniel Pipes

Israeli policy should be that there will be "no discussions on final status, no money, no arms, no concessions," Pipes said. "Palestinians need to come to terms [with the fact] that they lost, but that it's necessary to go on. No more pieces of paper."

He added that "20 per cent of Palestinians now accept Israel, and 80 per cent do not. That number has to be reversed."

Pipes said efforts must be made to have Jerusalem recognized by the world as Israel's capital by urging nations to move their embassies there, and the world must also accept that Palestinian refugees don't include the descendants of those who left Israel in the 1948 War of Independence.

Palestinians have suffered immensely because of "dictatorships, poverty and backwardness" and would "benefit more from their own defeat than the Israelis," he said.

"They must accept the fact that the conflict cannot be won."

Asked how the world could be persuaded to accept Jerusalem as Israel's capital, Pipes said part of the problem is Israel's own media.

"People look at the western media and wring their hands. But look at [the daily newspaper] Ha'aretz, or the Israeli Broadcasting Authority. If the Israeli media are harsh on Israel, what do you expect from the outside world?"

Replying to another question, Pipes described the election of a Hamas government in the Palestinian Authority as "honest terrorists succeeding dishonest terrorists," the latter reference being to PA President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah party.

He said Israel "created its own monster" by allowing Hamas to run in the elections, and he called the terror group a "far more determined and disciplined enemy."

Israel the No. 2 spot for MPs' sponsored travel

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — After Taiwan, Israel was the top destination for members of the House of Commons accepting trips paid for by outside groups in 2005.

Fourteen MPs, from all parties except the New Democratic Party, travelled to Israel under the sponsorship of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) or its affiliated Quebec-Israel Committee. Twenty-three went to Taiwan, the majority paid for by the Chinese International Economic Co-operation Association or other groups seeking to promote trade relations.

The information was made public by federal ethics commissioner Bernard Shapiro and is available on his office's website.

The commissioner's office, which was created in March 2004, is required to publish annually a report on "sponsored travel" by members of the House, as defined by their Conflict of Interest Code.

This is the first full-year report; Shapiro previously submitted one covering only the last three months of 2004.

The code requires members to declare any sponsored travel costs exceeding $500 within 30 days of their return. This is travel that arises from or relates to their position, and is not wholly paid for personally, by Parliament or a government body, by their party or any interparliamentary association or friendship group recognized by the House.

They are required to disclose who paid for the trip, its value, its length and purpose and who accompanied them.

The code does not set a cap or other restrictions on sponsored travel.

CIC government relations director David Cooper said he does not think the new light shed on sponsored travel will cause members to hesitate to accept such trips.

"Not at all," he said. "We are now preparing another trip, and there has been no challenge in getting anyone to come, nor has anyone cited the report."

About seven MPs are expected to go on a CIC trip in May, the first one organized exclusively for women. Another for everyone is planned for the summer.

The CIC organizes two or three such trips each year, Cooper said, and there are no plans to change that.

"Our trips have an excellent reputation on the Hill; they are well-balanced, highly educational and rigorous. No one views them as a junket," he said.

Cooper said New Democratic Party members have participated in previous years.

Cooper emphasized that taking a politician to Israel is an effective form of advocacy.

"There is no better tool in our arsenal for explaining Israel's story than bringing them there. They get a sense of the country's geography and topography that no seminar can [impart]. For example, nothing beats looking down from the Golan Heights to the kibbutzim below in the Galilee to understand Israel's strategic concerns."

Also, he said, spending a week with an MP is a good way of forming a personal bond.

The CIC also sponsors Israel trips for parliamentary staff. They do not have to report sponsored travel to the ethics commissioner.

Cabinet ministers and parliamentary secretaries are not permitted to accept sponsored travel.

However, three future ministers were on CIC trips last year: Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day, Fisheries and Oceans Minister Loyola Hearn and Justice Minister Vic Toews.

In the case of Day, who attended the annual Government of Israel conference in December, only his hotel costs of $1,157 were covered by the CIC.

Hearn and Toews, who went on a week-long July trip described as for the purpose of obtaining "information on the situation in Israel," list tabs for transportation, accommodation, meals and touring expenses totalling $7,482 and $5,123, respectively, for themselves and their wives.

Sponsored travel to Arab and/or Muslim countries was infrequent, according to the report. Former Liberal and later independent member, David Kilgour, who is no longer sitting, visited Egypt, Morocco and Tunisia for "meetings with government and business leaders," sponsored by the Christian Embassy.

Another former Liberal and independent, also now out of politics, Carolyn Parrish, listed a trip encompassing Lebanon, Syria, Jordan, the West Bank and Israel to "observe refugees." The sponsor is reported only as "combined."

She also went to Pakistan to learn about its "culture and customs," which she declared was half paid by "Friends of Carolyn Parrish, with non-tax-receiptable donations contributed by community members," and the other half by herself.

Shapiro reports that in 2005, there was a total of 67 instances of sponsored trips to a wide number of destinations in Canada and abroad by 44 of the 308 members of the House.

The last Jewish egg farmer in Quebec

Chickens seemed to fascinate my father and he was determined to establish his own farm

By HOWARD GONTOVNICK
Special to The CJN

STE-SOPHIE, Que. — For most people, eggs are something one has for breakfast or ingredients in a recipe. You find eggs in a supermarket, in baked goods, or served in a restaurant.

Well, in my case, the relationship is a little different. You see, for almost 50 years now, chickens and eggs have played a major role in defining who I am. At the same time, chickens and eggs have had an important impact on Jewish culture and the economic life of many in our community, which is a fact that is often forgotten. Do you remember the days when you could buy a dozen eggs at your front door from your local eggman – who spoke Yiddish? It is a tradition that has long since disappeared along with many Jewish farmers in Quebec.

When I was a young boy, there were several occasions that certain unfriendly neighbourhood boys would play on the fact that my father was in the "egg business." I was teased and called many uncreative names, sometimes getting into fist fights. Clearly, these were circumstances that were definitely not conducive to appreciation of my father's profession. Most probably influenced by this, I recall an occasion when I deliberately referred to my father as a salesperson, fearing the verbal abuse and worrying about what others would think of me. In time, maturity set in and I began to appreciate what my father did and how important farmers actually were.

My father, Louis Gontovnick, was born in the city of Montreal just after the depression. My grandparents, Rifka and Burach, had originally emigrated from eastern Europe in the hope of making a better life in Canada. Had it been up to my Zaide Burach, my dad would have gone to rabbinical college and our world would have been a much different place. However, chickens seemed to fascinate my father and he was determined to establish his own farm.

My dad's story begins with his initial experiences working on a farm during his formative years in the late 1940s. Inspired by farming life in Ste-Sophie and the people he knew who had established farms, he worked hard and put in long hours so he could learn as much as possible about the poultry business. Shlepping bags of feed and cleaning the chicken houses kept him in good shape, but the work occupied most of his days. After he had a few years of experience, it was time to take a chance and try to make his dream come true.

In the late '50s, Ste-Sophie, Que., was a small town in the Laurentians with a considerable Jewish population. With roots as far back to 1905, there was a strong and vibrant Jewish community flourishing at the time. It is one of the original farming colonies established by the Jewish Colonization Agency, and chicken farms for both eggs and broilers have had a long important history in the region. For my father, Ste-Sophie was the perfect location. With some money of his own and the support of his family, he purchased a piece of farmland on Second Pasley Road in the early 1960s. There he would build his first two-storey chicken house and the beginning of a new life.

During the 1960s and '70s, the control and distribution of eggs in Quebec was drastically changing. With the introduction of governmental marketing boards and controlled pricing, my father became an important contributor to radical developments in the egg industry. For many years, he served as a representative on several regional and federal committees, while continuing to remain involved with the farm in all its capacities. Each day was a new challenge as well as a wonderful opportunity.

With the assistance of his farmhand, Earl Urquhart, my father would feed the chickens, clean the building, and pick and process the eggs. After these daily farm chores, my dad would load his small pickup truck and head out to sell the eggs in and around the greater Montreal area. At the end of a long and difficult day, he would make his way to our home in Chomedey, Laval, only to begin again early the next morning.

From Ste Agathe to Montreal and places in between, my father could be seen delivering his eggs from house to house, to restaurants and to most of the major Jewish institutions in the region. I can remember many times delivering eggs in the early morning hours to the Jewish General or the Maimonides hospitals and benefiting from venturing into the nearby kitchens. Everyone knew my dad and they were all his friends.

With a limited number of customers and the price of eggs in the vicinity of 50 cents a dozen, this surely wasn't a high-profit business. Even so, he continued to work hard and enjoyed meeting and kibbitzing with the different people he would encounter along the way.

Throughout the 1980s and early '90s, the business grew considerably. My brother, Norman, and I joined, and we expanded our sales base into the commercial and wholesale markets. With our unique and original packaging, like Super Lou Jumbos, Oeufs Nature (we were the first to offer lower cholesterol eggs) and the clear plastic six-egg package called Oeufs Plus, our products created a positive association between the name Ste-Sophie and farm-fresh eggs. At that time, this once-small operation suddenly expanded into a fleet of 10 delivery trucks and a large processing plant with more than 20 regular employees. Then in 1994, the processing and commercial division was transferred elsewhere, and Norman and I were off in different directions.

These days after over 50 years in the farming business, my dad continues to operate his original egg farm in Ste-Sophie. With more than 15,000 chickens on site, most of the work is mechanized and watched over by a crew of two regular employees. Very different from the original facility, today's egg farm is equipped with automated machinery that feeds the chickens, provides water and ventilation and advances the eggs to a packaging device for further processing.

As for Ste-Sophie, the town has changed considerably. My father often recalls the times, friends and situations that made this community a special place. Today, less than a handful of Jewish families still live and operate businesses in the area. The village can be a quiet place compared to days gone by. Nevertheless, every fall the area is reborn as the little synagogue adjacent to our farm becomes a busy place. People come from everywhere to participate in the annual High Holy Days services.

For the last Jewish egg farmer in Quebec, it has been a journey filled with pride and satisfaction knowing that his life work contributed to the lives of so many people. Although he doesn't talk about it much, I know that my dad feels proud of what he has done and continues to do. Thinking about this has left me with a sense that his work was more than a job but rather a responsibility, and most of all, a way to maintain a respectable reputation. I remember many times when a customer would call in a state of panic that they were short of eggs and needed some eggs quickly. Immediately, with little hesitation, my father was off to the farm no matter what the weather conditions were like. From being a part of this experience, I have learned many valuable and timeless life lessons from my father and his profession. All too often we forget to tell others how we value them and appreciate the things they have done for us. From the complex to the simple, the impact of another's presence in one's life can have far-reaching consequences that are often unrecognized or acknowledged.

Olmert to form 'a top-heavy government'

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — Interim Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has big plans for Israel. And he is about to form a big government.

The prime minister entered what appeared to be a final week of coalition talks Sunday, with a deal all but clinched between his Kadima party and Labor.

With at least three other factions also set to come aboard, Olmert is looking at a mammoth cabinet of 27 ministers.

Such a top-heavy government is a price he believes he has to pay if he wants to push through further Israeli withdrawals from the West Bank: Kadima won last month's elections by a slim margin and by itself commands nowhere near a parliamentary majority.

For Labor leader Amir Peretz, the coalition talks scored a personal coup: the Defence Ministry. Having been denied the Treasury Ministry, which Olmert intends for Kadima to hold, the former union chair appears likely to be the successor to Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz and lead Israel's security apparatus through a stormy period despite having no military pedigree.

"From his first day on the job, Amir Peretz will have to prove the legitimacy of him being there. Everyone will be scoring his performance and seizing on his mistakes, all the time," wrote Alex Fishman, defence reporter for Yediot Achronot.

Aware of unease in Israel over how he will handle the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority, Peretz made it known that he would choose a deputy defence minister with top-brass experience.

The leading candidate is Labor's Ephraim Sneh, a retired brigadier-general in the Israeli military and veteran member of the Knesset foreign affairs and defence committee.

"The Israeli people can sleep well at night," Sneh told Israel Radio. "We need a defence minister with the proper combination of boldness and prudence, an ability to assess and decide," traits that Peretz possesses, Sneh said.

Labor was promised four other ministries — education, agriculture, infrastructure and tourism — as well as two ministries without portfolio.

As the nominations became clear, there were disappointed candidates on both sides of the talks.

Former Shin Bet chief Ami Ayalon and veteran economist Avishay Braverman, denied portfolios, said in interviews that by joining Labor, they had helped Peretz in the polls.

Uriel Reichman tendered his resignation from Kadima, saying he had only entered politics on the understanding he would be education minister.

Also miffed was Meir Sheetrit, a former finance minister who looks likely to lose out on a new stint in the post to Avraham Hirschson.

Mofaz was more reticent. According to media reports, Olmert may tailor a new, trade-related portfolio for the ex-defence minister in order to keep him in the cabinet.

That left only Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni keeping her position, while Shimon Peres was promised the Regional Co-operation Ministry he ran under the Barak government.

What does that leave for the other prospective coalition partners?

Avigdor Lieberman, head of the hawkish, pro-immigrant Yisrael Beiteinu, looks likely to win the Internal Security Ministry, though objections by Israel's attorney general threaten this. Lieberman has vowed to crack down on crime in Israel. He has been more circumspect on Olmert's West Bank plans, saying unilateral withdrawals will only embolden Palestinian terror.

Lieberman will also gain the Immigrant Absorption Ministry.

Shas, the religious party appealing mainly to Sephardi Jews, is expected to receive the welfare and housing portfolios. It is also expected to appoint a minister without portfolio who will have authority over religious matters – perhaps an indirect effort to rebuild the Religious Affairs Ministry, dismantled by the secular Shinui Party in the last government.

The last clutch of cabinet posts will go to the Pensioners' party, which took a surprising seven seats in the elections. The party's leader, former spymaster Rafi Eitan, will become the first Israeli pensioners' minister, having had the post custom-made. One of his colleagues is expected to take over the Health Ministry.

Iran poses a potential existential threat to Israel, new PM says he gave then-prime minister Ariel Sharon in 2004 before he brought his disengagement plan to the cabinet.

"Olmert is a new prime minister, and he wants to hear these commitments again," the official said, noting they would be domestically valuable for Olmert to market his convergence plan.

Bush's statement spelled out that the United States would support Israel's position that the Palestinian refugees should return to a future Palestinian state rather than to Israel, that it would be unrealistic to expect a full Israeli withdrawal to the pre-1967 Green Line and that the United States is committed to Israel's security, "including secure, defensible borders, and to preserve and strengthen Israel's capability to deter and defend itself, by itself, against any threat or possible combination of threats."

This last commitment, the official said, was especially important for Jerusalem to hear now, as Tehran continues to publicly threaten to destroy Israel.

Olmert referred to the Iranian nuclear threat in Sunday's cabinet meeting, but urged the ministers to keep a low profile and not to issue threats or warnings against Iran. He said Israel should leave this to others who are leading the international campaign to stop Tehran's nuclear march.

He added, however, that Iran poses a potential existential threat to Israel. He said the issue is at the top of Israel's agenda and that the country is preparing for all scenarios.

At the same time, he repeated what he has said numerous times in the past: "This is not only a threat to Israel," but also to Europe, the United States and all of western civilization. As such, Olmert said, it would be an error for Israel to place itself at the head of the world campaign against Iran.

In her briefing to the cabinet, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni discussed whether the UN Security Council was likely to impose meaningful sanctions on Iran, saying that the Russians and Chinese oppose such measures.

Russia, Livni said, is continuing to have independent contact with Iran in an effort to gain stature as a leading player on the international stage.

Turning to the Palestinians, Livni said the international community remains committed to the three conditions it has set for granting the Hamas-led PA legitimacy. She warned, however, that it would become more difficult to stand firm on these principles if the impression was created that there is a humanitarian crisis in the PA.

Livni said the recent Hamas cabinet decision to create a new security force and to appoint wanted terrorist Jamal Abu Samhadana as its head had further eroded the PA's position in the international community.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz told the cabinet that the recent terror attack in Tel Aviv, as well as the number of thwarted attacks, show that Israel is in the midst of a "growing terror wave." He said there are currently some 70 intelligence warnings of terrorist attacks, including 15 "localized alerts," a significant increase from February.

At the same time, Mofaz said the security forces have had a number of successes and that since the beginning of the year, they have thwarted 10 suicide attacks and arrested more than 160 terrorist suspects.

Mofaz said that while there was a significant decrease in the number of Qassam rocket attacks from Gaza last week – 16 compared to 33 the week before – on Friday, the Palestinians tried to launch a Katyusha missile toward Israel. This was the second time they tried to launch a Katyusha, the first being on election day, March 28.

Mofaz said Israel holds the Hamas-led PA responsible for the increase in terrorist attacks and the overall deterioration in the security situation.

Mofaz briefly discussed Egypt's relationship with the PA, saying that Cairo is trying to moderate Hamas's hard-line positions.

Proposal to amend Auschwitz's name receives mixed reaction

By DINAH A. SPRITZER
JTA

PRAGUE — Poland has long asked that its name no longer be used to refer to the Nazi concentration camps established on Polish soil.

Now Poland has made an official request to change Auschwitz's name.

The Polish government last month asked the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO) to change the name of the site from "Auschwitz Death Camp" to "former Nazi German Auschwitz-Birkenau Death Camp." The area is a UN cultural heritage site.

UNESCO is expected to respond to the request by mid-2006.

The debate goes to the heart of the question of how Polish behaviour during the Holocaust is remembered.

The name change is intended to stop the description of the camp by the international media, including the New York Times and the German magazine Der Spiegel, as a "Polish death camp," which offends many Poles because the camp was run by Germany.

Many Jewish groups and individuals, both in Poland and around the world, are backing the Polish request.

The Union of Religious Jewish Communities in Poland, representing the country's estimated 7,000 to 10,000 Jews, has released a statement in support of it.

Petr Kadlcik, the group's chair, said it is not historically accurate to assign to Poland the "institutional and national responsibility for the Third Reich's policy."

Jewish organizations including the Anti-Defamation League and Israel's Holocaust museum, Yad Vashem, have also supported the name change.

And Menachem Rosensaft, the founding chair of the International Network of Children of Jewish Holocaust Survivors, said in an e-mail that the Polish government's request is "absolutely legitimate. The death factory of Auschwitz-Birkenau, where more than one million Jewish men, women and children were murdered, was a German camp, conceived by the Nazi-German government and operated by Germans."

Poles have long complained that their victimization by the Nazis has been ignored. The issue was complicated by the fact that Poles were seen both as martyrs, since the Nazis labelled them "subhumans," and as victimizers because some were involved in anti-Semitic acts during and after World War II.

But not everyone agrees with the Polish government's request. Maram Stern, deputy secretary-general of the World Jewish Congress, accused Poland recently of trying to rewrite history with the proposed change.

Stern said that although the camp was built by Germany, everybody in the region knew of its existence, and workers were recruited from neighboring Polish villages.

This latter claim has been denied by the Polish government and some academics have refuted it.

An official with the Auschwitz museum criticized Stern's comments. "It is a pity that people from the World Jewish Congress, an organization whose name suggests that it represents the opinion of Jews living all over the world, say something which is totally absurd," said Karoslaw Mensfeld, a spokesperson for the State Museum of Auschwitz.

Israel Gutman, Yad Vashem's chief historian, said the name proposed by Warsaw "does not fully convey what really happened in this place.

"I appeal to the Polish government [that] the phrase 'site of the mass murder of Jews' be inserted into the camp's name," he wrote in a column for Poland's Dziennik newspaper last Friday.

Gutman's proposal was immediately attacked by the Polish historian Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, a former Auschwitz prisoner who favours the name change.

"Such a name would demand an additional commentary, because the version proposed by Gutman is not completely true," said Bartoszewski, a former foreign minister who was a member of the anti-Nazi resistance.

He noted that along with Jews, 22,000 Gypsies, 15,000 Soviet prisoners and 80,000 Polish Christians were murdered in Auschwitz, a fact no single name could possibly convey.

Divestment backers challenge Anglican Church

By JONNY PAUL
Jerusalem Post

LONDON — Supporters of divestment are challenging the Church of England's Ethical Investment Advisory Group (EIAG) after it rejected the church's call to divest from firms whose products are used by Israel in the territories.

In February, the Church of England heeded calls from the Episcopal Church in Jerusalem for "morally responsible investment in the Palestinian occupied territories" and agreed to divest from companies, such as Caterpillar, "that profit from the illegal occupation."

Riah Abu al-Assal, Anglican bishop of Jerusalem, contested Israel's use of Caterpillar bulldozers to demolish Palestinian homes and, in a vote, the Church of England voted to divest.

But last month, the EIAG voted unanimously against the decision, saying it "could find no compelling evidence that Caterpillar is or has been complicit in human rights abuses."

Two recent initiatives have surfaced against the EIAG decision: the "Interfaith Group for Morally Responsible Investment" under the auspices of Rev. Stephen Sizer, and War On Want, a U.K. charity that has opposed the EIAG decision in writing to the Church of England Commissioners.

Sizer, the vicar of Virginia Water in Surrey, is an ardent pro-Palestinian campaigner and divestment advocate. Signatories to his letter to the EIAG include a number of pro-Palestinian, anti-Israel charities and non-governmental organizations and Jews from the pro-Palestinian and anti-Zionist camp.

His letter urges the Angican Church to "make morally responsible choices in our investments in Israel and Palestine."

Caterpillar products were used for "human rights abuses," Sizer said, asserting that, "at best, the Church of England is condoning these abuses and, at worst, is complicit [in them]." He urged the advisory group to "visit Palestine and see first-hand the devastation caused by the use of Caterpillar bulldozers by the Israeli military."

Sizer met last week with the Archbishop's assistant secretary for international, ecumenical and Anglican communion affairs, Rev. Anthony Ball, and the interfaith relations adviser for the Archbishop's Council of the Church, Rev. Guy Wilkinson.

Wilkinson minimized the meeting's importance in a letter to the co-ordinator of Anglicans for Israel, Simon McIlwaine. "The EIAG did not overturn the Church of England's decision on disinvestment, since there was no decision to overturn," he said.

The other effort to reverse the EIAG's decision is headed by War on Want, a charity formerly led by radical British MP George Galloway that is very active in anti-Israel activities. It collected 19 signatures from Christian, Jewish and human rights groups on the pro-Palestinian side of the divide for its letter to the Church of England Commissioners.

The letter said 60 per cent of Palestinians live in acute poverty, "[a number that] tripled in just over four years," and refers to "despair" and "suffering" caused by Israeli policies.

It cites the "separation wall" and house demolitions as sources of poverty and blames western governments for Hamas' victory in Palestinian elections.

War on Want has campaigned vigorously to suspend the Israel-EU trade deal and called for sanctions against Israel.

France denies visa to Hamas minister

BY HERB KEINON
Jerusalem Post

JERUSALEM — Israel is "very satisfied" France will not issue a visa to Palestinian Authority Planning Minister Samir Abu Eisha to attend a conference in Paris later this week, a senior Foreign Ministry official said Saturday night.

This is the second times in as many weeks that France has denied a visa to a Hamas representative to attend a conference on its soil, and the third time that Hamas representatives haven't been allowed into Europe in less than a month. Belgium denied a visa to a Hamas representative at the end of March.

Unlike the other two refusals, which were explained as due to "technical reasons," this was the first time that a European official came out and said that the visa was denied in line with European policy to cut off political contact with the Hamas-led PA.

While Jerusalem was pleased at the French position regarding Eisha, there was concern that Norway would be the first European country to grant a visa to Hamas members and allow a delegation to visit there in mid-May at the invitation of a pro-Palestinian NGO.

One official in Jerusalem said Norway has indicated it might grant the visas, but that Norwegian government representatives would not then meet with the delegation. The official said that while Norway is not a member of the European Union, it has said that it would abide by the decisions made by the EU regarding Hamas. Norway's decision whether to grant visas to the delegation would be a "test case" of this policy, he said.

Israel Briefs

Terror victims identified

The nine people killed in the suicide bombing in Tel Aviv on April 17 were identified. They were Philip Balhasan, 45, of Ashdod; Ariel Darhi, 31, of Bat Yam; Victor Erez, 60, of Givatayim; Benjamin Haputa, 47, of Lod; David Shaulov, 29, of Holon; Lily Yunes, 42, of Oranit; Marcelle Cohen, 75, from France; and Rosalia Basalia, 48, and Pirosca Boda 50, of Romania.

Scores of bombings foiled

Israel has foiled scores of Palestinian suicide bombings this year, the head of the Shin Bet security service said. Briefing the cabinet last week, Yuval Diskin said 88 attempted suicide bombings had been prevented since the beginning of the year, including about a dozen within an hour or two of the planned attacks.

Katsav addresses Iranians

President Moshe Katsav has warned the Iranian people that their radical regime, with its insistent drive for a nuclear capability, poses a grave danger to global peace and security and is leading them toward the abyss. In an interview with the Jerusalem Post ahead of Independence Day, the president sent a message to Iranians stressing that "Israel is not against the Iranian people," and that he himself has "great love for Persian culture, Persian history." The Iranian-born president said Iran enjoys oil revenues that could potentially ensure a high standard of living and quality of life for its people. But instead of using that money to alleviate poverty, distress, illiteracy and the other economic and social problems facing many of his citizens, Iran's "fanatical, extremist president" Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and his regime are investing all of their resources in developing a nuclear capability

Iranian terrorists seek Brits

An Iranian terrorist group said it wants to recruit British Muslims for attacks in Israel. A spokesperson for the "Committee for the Commemoration of Martyrs of the Global Islamic Campaign" made the disclosure in comments to Britain's Guardian newspaper. "The first target is Israel. For us, that is the battlefield," Mohammad Samadi said. "All Jews are targets, whether military or civilian."

According to the daily, the terror group enjoys Iranian government backing. In 2003, two British Muslims carried out a suicide bombing in Tel Aviv, killing three Israelis. Hamas claimed responsibility for the attack, while Israeli officials said it was sponsored abroad. One of the bombers was linked to terrorists who carried out last year's suicide attacks on London's transit system.

Senator says U.S. backs keeping key settlements

Former prime minister Ariel Sharon helped shape a new consensus in U.S. attitudes toward the settlements, to the point where there is now "solid bipartisan support" for Israel's retention of the major settlement blocs, according to U.S. Senator Joe Lieberman. In an interview with the Jerusalem Post, Lieberman also said the United States might be sympathetic to Israel's annexation of such areas, were interim Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to implement his plan to withdraw unilaterally to the route of the West Bank security barrier. "I think the prevailing opinion here, particularly now with Hamas having won the elections on the Palestinian side, [is] that the Israeli government will be justified in taking unilateral action to secure defensible borders," Lieberman said.

Disband Hezbollah: report

A report by envoy Terje Roed-Larsen as a followup to Security Council Resolution 1559, which called for Syrian forces to leave Lebanon, urges the Lebanese government to dismantle Hezbollah. UN Secretary-General Kofi Annan said in the report that it's now also time for Syria to talk with Lebanon about exchanging embassies and marking the border between the two countries. The report urges Syria to play a positive role in helping to build Lebanon

Artist Barry Oretsky is known for his high realism

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

It's been 45 years since Barry Oretsky made the fateful announcement few Jewish mothers ever want to hear.

At the age of 14, he declared that he was going to become an artist. He left the academic stream at Harbord Collegiate and transferred to the commercial art program at Central Technical School.

The Toronto-born Oretsky, 59, an acclaimed painter who was inducted into the Royal Canadian Academy of Arts last year, exhibits in major galleries across North America and in London, England. He recalls that, as a teenager, he was given no parental support for his artistic aspirations.

"When I chose to make the move, it was a stressful situation. I had to prove the validity of my choice. I had to prove art was my gift, and I had to do extremely well to remain in the art school in Central Tech."

Today, an Oretksy painting carries a hefty price tag, but collectors will have the opportunity to own a more affordable original work at his first ever photography exhibit. The show, titled "Aspects," is running at Gallery One at 121 Scollard St. until May 9.

Oretsky is known for his high realism. "I paint in the 19th-century manner of the Orientalist school of painting," a style of painting in which the image is often derived from photographic resources.

He says this painting technique should not be confused with photo realism, a less sophisticated replication of the image.

Photography allows the artist to hold on to an image, he explains. "If you don't transcribe it quickly, you'll lose the situation, because nothing is static."

His works – particularly his reflection images – are complex paintings. "The reflection imagery is physically and mentally challenging because of the complexity and length of time it takes to produce."

Oretsky travels in Europe in search of the "perfect image," and a collection of the photographs resulting from these trips is on view in his current show.

He says he's been doing photography since 1970, but he never wanted to show this work. "I never wanted to confuse the issue. I was a painter. Photography was a means to an end, a part of the process. But people who saw my collection of images said, 'Why don't you show them?'"

He notes that it takes between 15 and 20 months to prepare for a major exhibition. "I'm always painting for the next show. It's exhibit or die, because you can disappear off the radar screen."

Oretsky has had a varied career in advertising and taught art in several schools in Toronto and in Israel since his graduation from Central Tech in 1965.

The following year, he won a full-year scholarship in post-graduate painting at St. Martins School of Fine Arts in London, Eng. He then went to Israel, where he worked on Kibbutz Maayan Baruch on the Lebanese border. He taught art at Tel Chai District Art School, and to this day, he maintains a close relationship with his "adopted kibbutz father," sculptor David Fine.

Between 1966 and 1972, Oretsky made several trips between Toronto and Israel and completed his military service in Israel. He also worked as a graphic artist at an Israeli advertising agency. He returned to Toronto and taught for three years.

In 1973, Oretsky made aliyah, arriving in Israel at the start of the Yom Kippur War. He left his young family at an absorption centre and rejoined his unit. The family subsequently settled outside Tel Aviv, where he again taught art and worked as a graphic artist for three years.

The family of four then returned to the Toronto area, where Oretsky headed the art department at Thornhill Secondary School for eight years. He continued to paint, but says he had little time to devote to his own art.

Oretsky remarried in 1987, and his new wife, Paula Perlmutar, encouraged him to give up his day job and paint full time.

Rehs Gallery, a well established dealer in New York City, took him on. "I was the only living realist painter they handled. I had a one-man show in 1989 in New York and things took off from there."

Since then, he has had shows in Toronto, Vancouver, London, Los Angeles and Palm Desert, and he's exhibited in major group shows.

The father of four says he does not live the traditional artist's life. "I live a Jewish family life. I've shlepped my kids to Bialik and CHAT and I paint on a schedule. I want to produce as much work as I can in my lifetime."

He says he feels very fortunate that he can devote his working life to painting. "To be full time for 18 years, it's been phenomenal. I have arrived at a level of proficiency I never dreamed I would arrive at."

Comedian Myron Cohen still funny on DVD

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

"Lots of comedians wanted to be Myron Cohen, but they couldn't because he was unique," comedian Steve Allen says in introducing viewers to the late Myron Cohen (1902-86) on a DVD of Cohen's comedy routine of 1976.

Two one-hour DVDs – On Location With Myron Cohen and Myron Cohen Revisited – were released in Canada and the United States in March by Kultur. Both were originally American cable network HBO specials.

"Cohen's mastery at combining storytelling, a Yiddish dialect and facial expressions like a closed eye, a shrug, couldn't be duplicated. Bob Hope couldn't tell dialect jokes, neither could Jack Benny. Myron Cohen had this form of comedy as art. Nobody else can do it," Allen says.

Cohen's Yiddish dialect tales, mostly of Jews in New York from his generation, came from his many years of working in New York's garment industry as a salesman in a high-stress industry. Cohen told these stories as a sales ploy to sell his brands to prospective buyers, and the buyers, friends and family encouraged him to go into show business when he was 45 years old in 1947.

Cohen had success in nightclubs, in the Catskill Mountains and on the weekly Ed Sullivan Show, where he appeared 47 times (11 appearances short of the record 58 appearances Wayne and Shuster made on the show). He also appeared 10 times on Johnny Carson's late-night talk show.

Cohen's humour was based on linguistic misunderstandings and cultural quirks, but he never used his put-on Yiddish accent as a way of demeaning his Jewish heritage. "The stories I tell are true and uplifting. The jokes are only demeaning if you're trying to demean, and I will never do that," Cohen says in Myron Cohen Revisited.

Myron Cohen

Both DVDs feature Cohen at his best, alone with his audience for 60 minutes. The 1976 On Location With Myron Cohen was filmed in Warwick, R.I., and Myron Cohen Revisited was filmed in Sarasota, Fla., in 1978.

Cohen's best stories come from tales of life as a senior, life as a Jew, husband and wife tales, and jokes about sex, but not of the blue kind one hears at comedy clubs. Words alone don't do justice to Cohen's tales without his dialect and funny facial gestures, but here are four gems from the DVDs:

• A policeman comes to break up a fight between a young black man and an old Jewish man. The policeman asks what happened.

"This ole Jewish dude called me a black bastard," says the black man.

"Is this true?" asks the policeman.

The Jewish man replies, "Oy, officer, this man is a fine gentleman. I would never call him such a name. I don't know what got him mad. He asked me for directions to the Regency Hotel and I told him [in a Yiddish dialect], 'You're a black bast it.'" (If you're not laughing, the Jewish man meant to say, "You're a block passed it.")

• A man from Texas comes to Israel and tours the sites with an Israeli. "Y'all should come visit my home," the man from Texas says. "When I drive, it takes me 10 to 15 hours to go across all the land I own."

"I totally understand," the Israeli says. "You know I used to have a car that drove like that."

• A Jewish man and woman file for divorce after 40 years of marriage. She says to the judge [Yiddish dialect]: "I put up with this creep for 40 years. I vant him to leave me the same way he found me."

Judge: "That's impossible."

Woman: "Vat you mean? He found me as a widow and he should leave me the same way, as a widow."

Judge to woman: "I am on your side in the divorce. I award you an allowance of $1,000 per week plus an extra $100 per week for other expenses."

Husband: "That's really nice of you judge. You're a nice guy for doing this, and I will chip in $50 myself."

• A man buries $50,000 in his backyard behind his home. The next day, he finds his money is gone and notices a trail of footprints to his next door neighbour's house, an Arab, and confronts him.

"You better tell me where my money is or I will kill you with my gun," he tells the Arab.

"No speaking English," says the Arab.

The Arab has an Israeli friend visiting him, and the man says, "You better tell the Arab in his language to tell me where my money is or he is a dead man.

"The Israeli asks the Arab where the money is, and the Arab says, "I buried it near the cherry tree in your backyard."

The Israeli tells the man waving the gun, "You better kill him. He won't say where the money is."

On Location With Myron Cohen and Myron Cohen Revisited DVDs are on sale in retail stores and online at www.amazon.ca or other websites such as www.kultur.com. For further information, call Kultur at 732-229-2343.

United 93 sets high bar for future movies on 9/11

Film recounts how passengers tried to overpower hijackers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Four commercial airliners were hijacked by Arab terrorists on that day of infamy on Sept. 11, 2001, when the world suddenly changed. One of the commandeered aircraft, United Airlines Flight 93, entered the realm of American mythology after passengers and crew tried to overpower the four hijackers in a valiant, yet futile, attempt to abort their suicide mission.

Flight 93 crashed in a field near Shanksville, Penn., killing all aboard. Two weeks ago, at the sentencing trial of 9/11 terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui, the heart-rending cockpit recording of the passengers' horrific ordeal was played in public for the first time.

Now, in United 93, a movie written and directed by Paul Greengrass, the drama is superbly recreated.

Billed as the first Hollywood film about Sept. 11, and scheduled to open in local theatres on April 28, it unfolds in real time, with a cast of unknown actors who turn in excellent performances.

More a docudrama than a straight feature film, United 93 unreels against the gut-wrenching backdrop of related events during which hijackers crashed planes, like guided missiles, into the World Trade Center in Manhattan and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C.

Indeed, almost two-thirds of United 93 dwells directly or peripherally on these incidents, which defined Sept. 11.

The film starts as the hijackers recite Islamic prayers in advance of their rendezvous with destiny. They are portrayed as tense young men who will stop at nothing to achieve martyrdom.

The scene shifts to Newark airport, where crew members indulge in idle chatter as they prepare for United Airlines flight 93's 5½-hour trip to San Francisco.

As the passengers settle in and the plane is readied for takeoff, the hijackers sit nervously in their seats.

Meanwhile, at the national air traffic control centre, another morning dawns. But within moments, ominous news filters in of a possible hijacking.

The mounting tension is palpable.

CNN, the cable news TV network, reports that a light plane has hit one of the two towers of the World Trade Center. Smoke billows from a tower. When flight controllers across the river in New Jersey subsequently witness an airliner crashing into the second building, they finally realize that the United States is experiencing a major terrorist incident.

Efforts to scramble U.S. fighter jets to intercept other possible intruding aircraft are stymied by bureaucratic delays and communication lapses, underlining the fact that the United States was patently unprepared for a catastrophe of this scale.

Amid these disasters on this sparkling late summer day, the United Airlines aircraft ascends. Passengers chat, look out the window, fiddle with laptops, eat breakfast.

It seems like a perfectly routine flight, except to the hijackers, who fidget and squirm.

Pandemonium breaks loose when they seize the plane in a torrent of Arabic and a fit of body lunges, hand motions and screams. The sheer terror that the passengers felt to the marrow of their bones is evoked by Greengrass in concise, masterful strokes.

In similar fashion, he captures the panic that overtakes the hijackers when they conclude that some of the passengers intend to foil their dastardly plot.

In United 93, Greengrass distills the horror and the heroism in sober and grim style. This is a strong, riveting film that has set the bar high for future movies about Sept. 11.

FILM FEST EXPLORES BLACK-JEWISH MUSICAL CONNECTION

Toronto's 14th annual Jewish film festival, which unreels May 6 to 14 at the Bloor Cinema and Al Green Theatre, features some 27 feature films, 43 documentaries, 16 shorts and animated films and other cinematic offerings, making it the largest of more than 100 international Jewish film festivals by number of films shown.

Sarah Silverman

Headlining the nine-day festival is Sarah Silverman: Jesus Is Magic (May 6, 9:30 p.m.), featuring Silverman, a gutsy comedian presenting her one-woman show, consisting of a series of outrageous jokes, song parodies and racy comic sketches. "No subject is taboo… [off-colour] language and sexual content," the program warns.

For the old-fashioned and the scatalogically challenged, the festival's "Rhythm & Jews" thematic track of 12 musical films will likely seem much more melodious. The lead piece, From Shtetl to Swing: A Musical Odyssey (May 7, 3:15 p.m.) sets the tone. A French-made documentary from director Fabienne Rousso-Lenoir, it traces the birth of American music from its roots in the Yiddish tradition through to vaudeville, Tin Pan Alley, Broadway, Hollywood, the Big Band era and jazz.

Hosted by actor Harvey Fierstein, From Shtetl to Swing celebrates the contributions of Irving Berlin, George Gershwin, Al Jolson, Sophie Tucker, Molly Picon, Eddie Cantor, Fanny Brice, the Marx Brothers, Benny Goodman, Artie Shaw and other legendary talents

In this and other films in this appealing series, a key theme is the cross-pollination between immigrant Jewish and black music and culture. "The blending of Jewish and black musical traditions is actually the story of American popular music," said festival curator Ellie Skrow

Other offerings in the series include:

• Porgy and Bess: director Trevor Nunn's production of the Gershwin musical, the only version endorsed by the Gershwin family

• Somewhere Over the Rainbow: Harold Arlen: focusing on the life and career of the famed Tin Pan Alley composer.

• Hitmakers: The Teens Who Stole Pop Music: highlighting Carole King, Neil Sedaka and other Jewish songwriters of the "Brill building" era.

• Godfathers and Sons: a study of the legacy of Chicago's groundbreaking Chess Records.

• Blue Note: A Story of Modern Jazz: a musical tribute to the famed jazz label and its German-Jewish founders.

• Immaculate Funk: a look at producer Jerry Wexler's collaboration with Ray Charles, Aretha Franklin, Etta James and other musical greats.

• Paul Robeson: Here I Stand: a profile of the deep-voiced African-American singer-activist who became a symbol for Jews around the world.

• Strange Fruit: the story behind Billie Holiday's controversial ballad.

• Brooklyn Babylon: a love story between an Orthodox Jewish woman and a Rastafarian musician.

Accompanying the series is a panel discussion (Al Green Theatre, Nadal JCC, May 9, 8 p.m.) that focuses on the history and issues related to the synthesis of Jewish and African-American music from the 1880s to the present.

As usual, the festival presents a wealth of screenings and a number of free events. For details, please visit the website, www.tjff.com. Tickets may be ordered online or by phone, 416-324-9121.

For the first time, students with appropriate identification will be admitted free to any film or event five minutes before it starts, provided seats are available. "We've always made low-cost admission to students a priority, and now adding free rush seats, when available, is a logical next step," said Helen Zukerman, festival executive director and co-founder.

Auschwitz Trumpeter Remembered: Ken Shuldman, author of Jazz Survivor: The Story of Louis Bannet, Horn Player of Auschwitz, celebrates the life and legacy of the late musician and TV host, who lived in Toronto for more than three decades. Bannet "played for kings and queens, monsters and madmen, and somehow survived the hell of all hells to become a renowned bandleader and host of one of Canada's most beloved television shows," Shuldman recalled. Israel's Judaica Centre, 870 Eglinton Ave. W., Thursday, April 27, 7:30 p.m. Kosher refreshments, free admission, everybody welcome.

•Warsaw Ghetto Program: The Winchevsky Centre commemorates the 63rd anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising with a screening of the Canadian documentary Out of the Fire, a talk by survivor and resistance fighter Faye Schulman and a performance of the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir. At the Galleries

• The Bat Mitzvah girls of Netivot HaTorah day school in Thornhill are creating a shulchan (table) cover as a commissioned project with artists Melanie Siegel and Rochelle Meister Diamond. Recycled fabrics embellished with gold threads are being used to depict the windows of Jerusalem. The work-in-progress goes on display, along with other works by Siegel, at the Mill Pond Gallery, Richmond Hill, April 30, 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. Students and their families are invited to view the work and sew a button on it. After its completion, the shulchan cover goes to the Baycrest Terrace Synagogue.

• The Willowdale Group of Artists presents more than 90 watercolours, acrylics, oils and mixed media pictures in its 59th juried art show. North York Civic Centre, 5100 Yonge St. April 29 to May 12.

Jonathan Safran Foer and September 11

By NORM RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Extremely Loud & Incredibly Close* by Jonathan Safran Foer, Houghton Mifflin, 2005.

It is difficult to approach the work of Jonathan Safran Foer without acknowledging his youth – he was born in 1977 – and the remarkable scope of his success. His first novel, Everything is Illuminated appeared in 2002, and rode the top of the New York Times bestseller list following raves from Joyce Carol Oates and Nathan Englander. It has been translated into more than 25 languages, and appeared as a film in 2005. Extremely Loud & Incredibly Close, his second novel, was equally well received.

Norman Ravvin

Because of his youth, Foer has been feted as a wunderkind. In an appreciation of Everything is Illuminated, the respected novelist Francine Prose wrote that Foer has "his sights on higher-much higher – things than mere laughs, on a whole series of themes so weighty that any one of them would be enough to give considerable heft to an ordinary novel. A partial list of the book's concerns includes the importance of myths and names, the frailty of memory, the necessity of remembrance, the nature of love, the dangers of secrecy, the legacy of the Holocaust, the value of friendship ...and I'm not even mentioning a whole host of sub themes."

This description is apt for Extremely Loud & Incredibly Close as well, although it does not take up the legacy of the Holocaust. Its key theme is the effect of the destruction of the twin towers on New Yorkers in general, and on nine-year-old Oskar Schell in particular, whose father was killed in the disaster. Much of the novel's action spans a roughly one-year period, set between the first and second anniversaries of Sept. 11.

Although rebuilding at Ground Zero is stalled due to disagreements between developers, architects, the Port Authority, and the governor of New York, artistic work in response to Sept. 11 proceeds apace. In the one office tower completed at the site by developer Larry Silverstein, the large screen projection work of artist Jenny Holzer is prominent. A number of movies are due in the coming months, including a rendering of the events on board the flight that crashed in a Pennsylvania field, and an epic production about the fall of the towers by director Oliver Stone. Author Jay McInerney recently released The Good Life, a novel dealing with Sept. 11. But Foer was ahead of them all. His book can be read as a key document reflecting the way Americans will live with the events.

Though Francine Prose celebrates Foer's willingness to pack his books with a "series of themes so weighty that any one of them" could support a novel, not all readers will agree that this method succeeds.

Foer's second novel is not as free-wheeling as his first. Its narrative hangs on young Oskar's search for remnants and reminiscences of his father, which is motivated by a key found among the dead man's possessions. Because Oskar is one of those irrepressible, brainy youths we sometimes encounter in fiction about New York City, he embarks on great adventures in search of the key's meaning. He scours Central Park. He finds his way around the outer boroughs, and interviews a variety of sympathetic strangers in pursuit of a hoped-for link with his father.

In his ramblings, Oskar is a literary descendant of J.D. Salinger's smart, saintly youths in The Catcher in the Rye, Franny and Zooey, and the breakthrough stories A Perfect Day for Bananafish and For Esme with Love and Squalor. Salinger's genius came, in part, from his willingness to view sophisticated city life from the perspective of children and adolescents. Their vision, free of what The Catcher in the Rye's Holden Caulfield dubs phoniness, put American life at mid-century into remarkable focus. The outcome was a humourist's take on very serious themes, along with an opening, in adult literature, for the voice of youth.

Foer approaches his key event – the destruction of the twin towers – obliquely. Key motifs suggesting the events include the repetition of phone messages left by Oskar's father just before his death. "It's me again," one of them announces. "Are you there? Hello? Sorry if. It's getting a bit. Smoky. I was hoping you would." The word terrorist is used remarkably few times in the novel, and when the name Mohammed Atta abruptly appears, no direct link is made between the man and the disaster he brought about.

Foer's novel makes use of numerous illustrations to evoke Sept. 11. Their presence makes Extremely Loud & Incredibly Close a collaborative effort, the suggestion being that the work of photographers portraying the morning the towers were destroyed is somehow more telling and more intimate than anything that can be offered in prose. An image that re-appears many times depicts, on one side of the page, the familiar latticework of the towers' facade, while on the other side, a body falls limply across a white sky.

Oskar, desperate to recover some contact with his pre-Sept. 11 life, wonders if this falling body might be his father.

The outcome of Oskar's wanderings in New York's far-flung neighbourhoods is a knitting together of disparate city voices. With his precocious innocence, he coaxes stories, many related to Sept. 11, from nearly everyone he meets.

Alongside this action are more shadowy narrative strands. One of these portrays Oskar's grandmother's youth in prewar Dresden, as well as her own damaged marriage. Her life is shattered by the Allied bombing of Dresden (a provocative subtheme, but one that is only lightly worked out). These sections, told in the grandmother's voice, are disarmingly similar to those that depict Oskar. She, like Oskar, is a kind of naive savant, able to draw deep meaning from disaster. To further his musing about the willfulness of man to bring about catastrophe, Foer includes an excerpt from a Hiroshima survivor's testimony. There is no attribution in the novel regarding this section, and the reader must infer that it is Foer's own rendering of material he found in John Hersey's Hiroshima, or watched on documentary footage.

The effect of the many weighty themes in Extremely Loud & Incredibly Close is that everything is not illuminated. The novel's conclusion – though admittedly one reached for by a child narrator – is childish, as it proposes the wish that everything on the terrible morning might go backwards. There is a too-clever use of photos at the end of the book, which enacts this wish.

One wonders what J.D. Salinger, silent in his house in the New Hampshire woods, might think of Oskar Schell, as he bangs his tambourine, charms doormen, surfs the web, rides the subway out to the Bronx, all the while offering up his youthful precocity as a balm to a city torn by terrorism. It may all be, as Holden Caulfield might say, a little phony.

Norman Ravvin is chair of Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies. His books include the story collection, Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish and A House of Words: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory.

Rabbi recommends making a living will

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Whether or not to continue a patient's treatment is one of a number of halachic issues related to end of life, says Rabbi Eliezer Breitowitz, rosh yeshiva of Yeshiva Darchei Torah.

Speaking at a recent panel discussion sponsored by Useful Ideas, a firm of financial security advisers, Rabbi Breitowitz said that one of the factors to take into consideration is the definition and time of death.

"Obviously, beyond this point there is no need to continue treatment, yet an issue arises when the person is still alive and the caregivers want to discontinue treatment. Halachah says we cannot actively do something to shorten life."

Halachah does not recognize the right to die, he said, "because a person is not considered a master of his own life. At best he is a trustee. It is not his prerogative to squander his life.

"On what basis do we make our decision? If the patient cannot decide himself, we [could] concoct the scenario in which he is committed to Halachah, yet his caregivers are not."

Time of death, said Rabbi Breitowitz, is the cessation of breathing, "but with the development of technology that can take over respiration, a person can be dead but still breathe with a machine."

In hospitals, he said, there is tremendous pressure put on families to withdraw life support. "It frees up equipment and it facilitates organ donation. They consider it the moral choice."

The time is coming when OHIP will refuse to administer care to patients who are brain dead, "and that will put additional pressure on families because the cost will be too much," he said.

Halachah does not describe a certain course when we talk about withholding treatment, he said, but there are situations when it is best not to initiate treatment.

This includes when a person is terminally ill and his life expectancy is less than one year, the underlying condition is irreversible, or else a person is in great pain and the only possible consequence of treating him would be to extend his life in a painful state, Rabbi Breitowitz said.

Judaism thus attempts to strike a balance between prolonging life and the recognition that life may become unbearably difficult and painful, he said.

A living will, said Rabbi Breitowitz, attempts to spell out in advance which treatments should be employed and which should not. If a person is unable to make his own decisions, [his proxy] needs advanced directive.

"By giving informed consent, nothing can be done to a person against his wishes, and specific instructions are given about what should be done under certain circumstances."

A proxy is obligated to follow instructions, said Rabbi Breitowitz, and in the absence of instructions, he has to figure out what the patient would have wanted.

He urged the group to fill out a [living will form] and "give thought to it. It is also important to distribute it to family or physicians – anyone who is in the position to make a decision. It should not be stashed away."

There are two different attitudes to Halachah, said Rabbi Breitowitz. "Some look at it as an obstacle course and others look at it as a path to an enriched and spiritual life.

"When you make a decision without guidance, imagine the doubt, fear and guilt that ultimately arises. Imagine [again] your peace of mind if you know you followed Halachah."

The beauty of Halachah, he said, is that it gives us the confidence that we did the right thing. A living will facilitates that.

Cutting off Hamas 'a no-brainer,' ex-envoy Norm Spector says

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA – Prime Minister Stephen Harper and his government did the right thing by refusing aid to the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority, says Norman Spector, a former Canadian ambassador to Israel and the Palestinian Authority.

As keynote speaker at the fourth annual Passover lunch sponsored by the Ottawa chapter of Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Spector praised Harper for acting quickly – even ahead of U.S. President George W. Bush in withholding aid as long as Hamas refuses to recognize Israel and denounce terrorism.

"To me it was a no-brainer that the day that Hamas took over, we would cut our funding," Spector told the April 18 gathering at Agudath Israel Congregation.

"Whatever you think of the policy… it was rather remarkable to see Canada being the first to act… by getting out first, Harper showed he was not a Bush follower."

Rather than simply withholding aid, however, Spector said he would advocate using Canadian aid to the Palestinians to try to influence Hamas' behaviour.

"I accept the argument that we and other countries should accept the result of that election. As a society, democracy is one of our fundamental values," he said.

"For all this talk that Hamas was elected because of corruption, by and large there is not an understanding in Palestinian society that Israel has a legitimate right to exist, and that is why there is support for terrorism. The war we are in is an ideological war. It is a war of ideas and fundamentally that is what has to be changed if there is to be a change. I think we make a mistake by not constructively engaging them… in trying to use the pressure and all the leverage that western governments have to get Hamas to change their position."

Spector admitted, however, that "the odds are not great" Hamas will modify its approach.

But he criticized those who advocate cutting off all contact with the group.

"I think we should be finding some way to explain to Hamas what it is going to take to become an accepted and respected member of the international community, and even if there is just a one per cent chance of success, we should take that chance… you never know – we might just succeed," Spector said.

"We cannot foreclose any possible avenue to trying to resolve this conflict, and as good as it feels to say we have cut off all contact with them, it won't work."

Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, also spoke to the gathering, "as a graduate of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem and the father of a graduate of the Hebrew University and the husband of a spouse who, until a year-and-a-half ago, was a member of the staff of the Hebrew University."

Na'amat fundraiser set

Proceeds of Na'amat's upcoming Gala 2006 will go to the Achva Daycare Center, in a low income neighbourhood of Be'er Tuvia, Israel.

Na'amat hopes to refurbish Achva day care and give the children the opportunity to learn and be cared for in a safe and comfortable environment.

Na'amat envisions a future for the day care that has no more broken walls and doors. Instead, it sees brightly painted classrooms filled with books, toys and games and playgrounds with swings, slides and sandboxes.

The gala, which takes place on Wednesday, May 10, at 6:30 p.m. at the Regency, will honour Henry Ender and Yael Soglowek Ender.

The evening features world-renowned mentalist Marc Salem. He will take his audience on an excursion into the possibilities of the human mind through a series of hilarious, astounding and mystifying mind games.

The Regency is located at 8400 Jane St. in Concord, Ont. Tickets are $175 per person and are available by reservation only. Call 416-636-5425 or e-mail naamat@bellnet.ca.

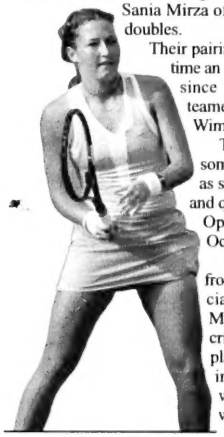
Israeli-Muslim tennis duo makes headlines

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

KEY BISCAYNE, FLA. — Top Israeli woman tennis pro Shahar Peer has been making world headlines by teaming with Sania Mirza of India, a Muslim, in women's doubles.



Shahar Peer
[Alese & Morton Pechter photo]

Their pairing in October marked the first time an Israeli paired up with a Muslim since Aismal Qureshi of Pakistan teamed with Israel's Amir Hadad at Wimbledon in 2002.

The Mirza-Peer team has posted some impressive results, finishing as semifinalists in the Japan Open and quarter-finalists at the Thailand Open in consecutive weeks in October 2005.

Peer has received much praise from fans, family and tennis officials in Israel for playing with Mirza, but Mirza has been widely criticized by Indian Muslims for playing with Peer. Despite angering many Muslims by teaming with an Israeli – as well as wearing a short skirt and even playing tennis at all – she is not dismayed.

"Shahar and I have become friends and nobody is going to come between our friendship as well as doubles partners," said Mirza, 19, following her first- round loss at the NASDAQ-100 Open in Key Biscayne. "I have been accustomed to being criticized by some and know that I am a role model to many girls in India, so I will not back away."

Pakistani tennis officials had threatened to ban Qureshi from playing in the Davis Cup because he had teamed with an Israeli, but Mirza faces no such pressure because India maintains diplomatic relations with Israel.

Nevertheless, in February, numerous threats while playing a tournament in Bangalore, India, may have affected her choice of doubles partner. According to a report in Israel, Mirza was quoted as saying, "It is best that Peer and I don't play together this time… There is no reason to arouse their [Muslims'] ire." Mirza went on to win the doubles title, while Peer finished as a doubles semifinalist.

"I want to emphasize that politics will not get in the way of my choice as a doubles partner. I like Shahar and know that I will play well with her. I was going to play doubles in Key Biscayne with her, but she selected another player," said Mirza.

Peer, who was born in Moakim, a settlement in the West Bank, is surprised at the headlines she and Mirza are making.

"I never like to mix sports with politics. Sania and I are just tennis players, not ambassadors [for] world peace. If people take pride in us playing together, that's great. I don't think of her as anything but a good friend and tennis player," said Peer following her first-round loss at the NASDAQ-100 Open.

Peer, 18, is in her first year in the Israeli army but has not traded her tennis racquet for a rifle. "I am a secretary to a colonel, not in combat, and he is my biggest fan playing tennis. The army has not limited my schedule in any way," she said.

Peer won her first pro tournament in Pattaya City, Thailand, in February. She's ranked 36th in the world – the highest among Jewish women players – while former Soviet resident Anna Smashnova is ranked 42nd. It is the first time in history two Israelis have been rated among the top 50 pro women players.

As Israelis, Peer and Smashnova face obstacles, as do the Israeli men's doubles team of Jonathan Erlich and Andy Ram, when pro tournaments are scheduled for Dubai, United Arab Emirates and Qatar. Both Arab nations ban anyone with an Israeli passport from entering the country.

None of the four players travelled to the Arab countries for events last February, nor do they have plans to do so in the future, despite the reassurances of tournament officials that special exemptions would be granted for the Israeli players.

Larry Scott, chief executive officer of the Women's Tennis Association, who is Jewish and a former player, said that "no player that is otherwise eligible to play at these tournaments should be forbidden to play or the tournaments would lose our sanction."

"I can't play there no matter what Scott says because I am in the army," said Peer. Although Smashnova feels strongly about playing in Arab nations, Erlich and Ram are considering it.

"We can't say we will never go there, but Jonathan and I have to think about this a great deal before agreeing to go there," said Ram. Erlich and Ram made headlines of their own by becoming the first Israelis to finish as semifinalists at the NASDAQ-100 Open.

Along with tournaments in Dubai and Qatar, the women's tennis circuit will stop in Tel Aviv later this year.

"I am definitely eager to play back home in October and look forward to being there," said Peer.

Barring injury, Canadian fans will see Peer and Smashnova compete in Montreal at the Rogers Cup, to be held Aug. 12 to 20. Fans in Toronto can see Erlich and Ram attempt to improve last year's finish as doubles finalists at the Rogers Cup, Aug. 5 to 13. For more information, visit www.tenniscanada.com.

CHAT wins prestigious YU hoops tourney

NEW YORK — The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) made a little basketball history earlier when it became the first team from outside the United States to win Yeshiva University's (YU) Red Sarachek Basketball tournament.

CHAT defeated Frisch School of Paramus, N.J., 52-42 April 3 to claim the coveted high school championship.

The tournament took place at YU's Max Stern Athletic Center in Washington Heights, New York.

On its way to the ultimate victory, CHAT defeated last year's champion, Young Israel of Century City, one of two tournament teams from Los Angeles. The two players credited with CHAT's successful run in the tournament were guard/forward Kevin Treger and the team's 6-7 centre Jared Mintz, who finished the championship with a game-high 21 points.

Before CHAT's win, no team outside the United States had ever advanced to the championship game of the Sarachek Tournament, which began in 1992.

Other Canadian teams that have participated in the tournament in the past several years include Hebrew Academy of Montreal and Yeshivat Ohr Chaim of Toronto, both of which also qualified this year.

The 2006 tournament featured 18 Jewish high school basketball teams representing schools in Los Angeles, Chicago, Atlanta, Dallas, Memphis, and Boca Raton. YU's High School for Boys (Marsha Stern Talmudical Academy), Ramaz of Manhattan, Frisch, and North Shore Hebrew Academy of Long Island rounded out the New York-area contingent.

The annual Sarachek Basketball Tournament is named for YU's legendary men's college basketball coach, Bernard "Red" Sarachek, who died Nov. 25 at age 93. Sarachek was widely considered a basketball innovator and trailblazer.

Argo lineman Noah Cantor retires

Four-time Grey Cup winner Noah Cantor has announced his retirement from the Toronto Argonauts, bringing to an end a solid 11-year career in the Canadian Football League.

The defensive lineman said he was retiring to spend more time with his family in Vancouver.

"My children are getting older and my business has been growing and I need to focus my energy in those areas," Cantor said in a news release. "The last three years of football have been great. My time with the Argos has been the most fun I have had in my career because of my incredible coaches, the close bond I share with my teammates and the support of the owners, our fans and the entire organization. I have had an amazing 11-year career in this league and I know I will miss it. I will definitely continue to cheer on the Argos for years to come."

A native of Ottawa, Cantor broke into the CFL with the Argos in 1995 after attending Saint Mary's University. In his first three-year stint with the Boatmen, he won Grey Cups in 1996 and 1997. He joined the B.C. Lions in 1998, winning a third championship in 2000.

After five years in Vancouver, Cantor returned to Toronto in 2003 and won his last Grey Cup the next year while leading the club in quarterback sacks with 10. Cantor also finished with a career-high eight passes knocked down. He was rewarded as an East Division all-star and a CFL all-star.

Adam Rita, general manager and vice-president of football operations for the Argos, said he will miss his longtime friend.

"Noah has had a brilliant CFL career in both Toronto and B.C. I've known Noah for his entire career and feel honoured to have shared the past 11 seasons with him. We've been fortunate to have had a player of his abilities. Noah's locker room presence and his determination and desire on the field will be missed. He's moving on with his life now, and his future looks bright. On behalf of the entire Argonauts organization, I wish him the very best of luck."

Cantor owns and operates Vera's Burger Shack, a restaurant chain in Vancouver, where he lives with his wife Donna and their three children, Rachel, Maya and Wesley.

My dad: ahead of his time

By MICHAEL GORDON

I recently visited my father, who at 95 years of age still manages reasonably well in a Chicago retirement home, with lots of support from my sister.

The Senior Side of Life

I was impressed with how alert he was, and how well he communicated and responded to questions – humorously and with cogent answers. He watches movies and reads the newspaper each day, though his tendency to keep and scatter papers around his apartment causes some consternation for his housekeeper. Lately, he has required some assistance bathing and getting dressed, and he needs supervision with his medication. Other than that, he walks (assisted by a walker) and attends a daily lunch program run by the City of Oak Park that uses his retirement home as its dining room. My father enjoys the company and the subsidized price.

During my trip, we ate breakfast at one of his favourite pancake houses. As I watched him finish a hefty (American-size) omelette with all the trimmings, I mused that he must have done something right to be in such relatively good shape at his age. He did have a heart attack in his 60s and cardiac bypass surgery in his early 90s, but to get to 95 and be able to eat an omelette, he must have had some formula for successful aging, particularly since he smoked for many years, as did many of his generation.

I have memories of him breaking off pieces of uncooked broccoli and cauliflower and eating them– and hearing my mother ask how he could eat them raw. He also loved raw turnip and rutabaga, as well as almost every other uncooked vegetable (including potatoes, at times). These food preferences seemed weird in those days, long before the onset of the North American health food craze. I recall family trips from Brooklyn to the outer reaches of Long Island, which was primarily farmland at the time, to buy vegetables, which he nibbled on as we drove home, occasionally making satisfied comments as he tasted fresh cabbage or, best of all, a beefsteak or plum tomato.

My father also inadvertently started hmself on an exercise program, not for health reasons, but out of financial necessity – he acquired a local newspaper delivery business. He awakened early in all seasons and drove and ran around a 50-square-block area for 1½ to two hours each day delivering newspapers. On Sundays, the deliveries expanded to include about 300 to 400 Sunday New York Times, so it was not just running but weightlifting that kept him in shape.

During my high school years, I helped my father on Sundays, and when I got my driver's licence, I helped out on weekdays as well, although not every day, as I had some early morning classes and swimming practice. Each day, my father did the routine, driving up a street, stopping, then running with half a dozen rolled-up newspapers (the New York Times and New York Daily News) that he deftly tossed toward customers' front doors. Each paper would hit its target and slide down gently to where the homeowner could conveniently pick it up to read with the morning coffee.

So, my father was both an exercise maven and a nutrition guru without ever having read or heard of either concept, which had yet to appear in the popular media. But he exercised and ate well consistently for many years, and even in the face of his smoking history, these habits likely helped him reach his 95 years.

He still enjoys raw vegetables, though he's no longer able to run around. But he loves to read newspapers, and he's pretty good at getting about with his fancy, wheeled walker.

Sesame-Crusted Tilapia Fillets

Tilapia has a lean, white flesh, a firm texture and a sweet, mild flavour. The crispy, sesame seed crust lends a nuttiness that accents the fish without overpowering its delicate nature.

4 tilapia fillets
1 tblsp. soy sauce
1 tblsp. sesame oil
1/4 tsp. freshly ground pepper
6 tblsps. sesame seeds
1 tblsp. vegetable oil

Place fish in single layer in shallow baking dish. Drizzle with soy sauce and sesame oil; sprinkle with pepper. Let stand 10 minutes. Press sesame seeds onto both sides of fillets.

Heat vegetable oil in large nonstick skillet over medium-high heat until hot. Add fish; cook 4 to 5 minutes or until golden brown and fish just begins to flake, turning once.

Epi on Education

My problem with Jewish continuity

I have told the story before, but ... In the first difficult days of the Yom Kippur War, Jews started wearing a badge that said "Israel Must Live."

Seymour Epstein

An Israeli shaliach (emissary) who is also a personal friend asked me how I would feel if he wore a button that read "Epi Must Live."

"Sick," I answered.

That was the last time I spoke of Jewish survival.

"Jewish continuity" is a survivalist slogan. A few years back, well-meaning people turned the phrase into a veritable campaign for Jewish education. Jewish education, though, has never been about mere survival. It's all about creative growth and development.

As we find ourselves in the shivah days between Yom Hashoah, Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut, we must remember that both in the catastrophe of the Nazi Holocaust and in the Zionist revolution that created the Jewish state, we see the evidence of Jewish creativity, imagination, pride and courage.

In the horrific years of World War II, wherever there was an opportunity for some form of resistance – spiritual or militant, passive or overt – Jews, who acted not for survival or continuity, resisted for the sake of Jewish greatness. Indeed, there were sad times when the survivalists differed forcefully with the militants on this very issue.

Israel was not created by minimalist survival thinking, nor by Jews who were satisfied to continue the status quo of the Jewish people. It took innovative thought and creative imagining to establish political and cultural Zionism as a mainstream direction for the Jewish people. And it took force, born of pride and courage.

Forget about the Jewish problem for a moment and think about education in general. It cannot be merely about continuity, or we will be dooming our grandchildren to a world like ours, full of hate, war, and ecological disaster.

Education in general, and Jewish education specifically, is based on the premise that the world we live in can be enhanced and that it is our responsibility to do so – not by survivalist continuity, but rather by creativity, innovation and personal growth.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Trusting my inner student

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

I once met a very gifted man who stopped playing piano after 25 years because he said he'd had enough of it. I couldn't understand how someone could stifle his creativity just like that.

URBAN WRITER

About a year ago, after four years of painting, I stopped as well – just like that. Within that 48-month period, I had painted more than 50 pictures including one of a cousin who perished in the Holocaust and another of a tallit with Jewish letters in the background floating up to the sky.

I was different than the piano man, however, because I wasn't bored nor was I uninterested in learning more brushstroke techniques or more about colour to create light and shadows. I hadn't had enough; I had just hit a creative wall.

I have never been much for teachers, choosing instead to learn things on my own. I chose this path because traditional education – lecturing and remembering – never worked well for me. I therefore believed it was possible to achieve real growth by figuring things out on my own and thought this was in sync with Leonardo da Vinci's words, "A painter ought to study universal Nature, and reason much within himself on all he sees." I pushed myself harder and harder to see things as I felt they really are and convert those images onto canvass.

Growing in this way worked well for me, at least for a while. I discovered that using my fingers to paint would create a bold expressionistic texture; that there was much grey in nature and dabs of it throughout a landscape would add more realism.

I read books on Rembrandt, van Gogh and Picasso. I even dabbled in the philosophy of art, reading What Art Is by Ayn Rand in a bid to determine if painting is just a sophisticated form of arts and crafts or indeed as Rand contends, "The indispensable medium for the communication of a moral idea." Was I spending my time on something that would bring me closer to truth or simply upping the crayon standard?

Eventually I hit a wall, or perhaps the wall hit me. As hard as I tried, I couldn't master the challenging technique of painting creases on a frayed Turkish shirt, and as time passed, I seemed to be losing focus, getting lost in layers of thought. I was spiralling backward, so that my animals looked less animated and my flowing water looked stagnant and detached from the shores surrounding it. But I contended, this was my downward drip, and insisted I preferred stymied progress to mimicking someone else's instruction.

I think I was mistaken, however, and never truly understood the teacher-student relationship. I didn't understand that an art teacher adept at his/her craft wouldn't paint the creases for me, as I feared, but would instead encourage me to look closer at the folds and pleats in Renoir's fashionable Pri Madonna in The Parisian or Alfred Sisley's water in Flood at Port-Marly, and subtly promote my wonderment so that it translated into self-actualization. I missed the fact that instruction from someone else would enhance what lay within me, not detract from it.

I have since set up an easel in my study and a canvas seduces me every time I open the door. I am looking for an art teacher whom I will defiantly learn from, at least until I trust my inner student.

I once met a man who stopped pounding those ivory keys. I think he didn't want to be a student of that instrument and that it is possible for someone to decide they have learned enough. I don't believe that is the case with my art and me.
